A good example of that was shown on a television programme last night called "Out of Court". A gentleman living in the Tooting area waged almost a one-man campaign, supported by neighbours. He made it plain that his wife and daughter did not like to go out on their own unless accompanied by a male member of the family. For a time at least, that enterprising gentleman kept a bucket of water at the front door because some prostitutes were, on occasion, not only passing by in order to advertise their wares but were performing the deed in his front garden.

It is intolerable in a civilised society that there should be no-go areas for respectable citizens. [Interruption.] Does my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) wish to intervene? I hear sedentary mutterings behind me. If not, I shall continue.

So we have an ever-increasing problem. I can do no better than encapsulate it in the words of the lady who wrote to me and to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and who lives in an area such as I have described. She says:

> "For years now I have been unable to walk out of my flat without being accosted by men in cars. They wink at me, flash their lights, ride alongside of me, speak to me and even offer to up the price . . . Irrespective of what I am wearing these men, both English and foreign and some of them obviously well educated, see me as a street walker. I can be carrying shopping from Sainsburys, dirty washing to the launderette, riding my bicycle, walking the dog round the square, and worst thing of all is that I cannot go out into the street and look for a cab. I have to phone for one thus paying more money. When I alight from a boyfriend's car immediately outside my own front door, a passing car will assume that I have just left a client so waits for me.

She adds:

> "The time of day is of no consequence either. I can be dashing to Sainsburys at 5 pm on Saturday, going to work at 8.30 am and coming home at 6 pm. Need I say more?"

That effectively sums up one woman's view.

The community action groups to which I have spoken endorse that wholeheartedly. The co-ordinator for the Balham action group has told me that, since he undertook that unofficial post, he has been inundated with phone calls, and calls from women who have complained to him about the unpleasantness that they have suffered. Approaches are often accompanied by extremely unpleasant language and swearing.

Let us be under no illusion as to the difficulties. The bulk of cars has caused one group in Birmingham to tell me that it sees more cars during the later evening than during the rush hour. We have a real problem and one which can almost cause nervous complaints in people who feel particularly susceptible and sensitive.

What is so extraordinary is that there is no proper law to deal with this undoubted public nuisance. We thought for a while that there was——

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): There is in Scotland.

Miss Fookes: I hear a little noise from my hon. and learned Friend. I should say that the Bill applies to England and Wales only. We all know that Scotland is different.

What can we do? We thought at one time that the Sexual Offences Act 1956 covered the offence of a man importuning for immoral purposes. Ten years later, in 1966, in a case called Crook v. Edmondson, it was established that the Act did not apply to a man soliciting from a woman for sexual purposes. I find that interpretation of the law extraordinary—quirky to say the least. But since that case law was established, it cannot be relief upon. In the case of residents—the pressure is usually from residents—the police have sought to take action under other Acts, dredging up no less than an Act of 1361, the Justices of the Peace Act. That is bending the law somewhat, because it is intended for breaches of the peace and for binding over to be of good behaviour. Although there may be occasions when that is appropriate, it is unsatisfactory that there is no modern law to deal with a modern form of an old offence.

Mr. Fairbairn: If a man approaches a woman in the street and asks her whether she dyes her hair, that would be a breach of the peace. If he asks her to sleep with him, that would certainly be a breach of the peace. What is wrong with the common law?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): There is no proper penalty.

Miss Fookes: My hon. Friend says that there is no proper penalty, but if one considers that a particular offence is unpleasant and unwelcome, it should be dealt with by a modern Act specifically aimed at it, not by relying upon some generality. Clearly, the police have found it difficult to move in such circumstances and they would have the interest in prosecuting. For those reasons, we need a modern law to help us.

That is also the view of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. This seems to be an appropriate moment to express my gratitude to that committee, and particularly to the chairman and Sir George Waller who have been kind enough to discuss with me the work that they have undertaken over several years. It gives me much greater confidence in proposing the three new offences, about which I shall talk in a moment, to know that those are recommendations from that distinguished body.

The committee took wide soundings from all sorts of groups, not only from the legal profession, but from the National Council of Women of Great Britain, the Mothers Union and the English Collective of Prostitutes. I do not think that it left anybody out who might have possible views upon the matter.

The committee modified its view from one stage to another and it has now recommended three new offences which form the first three clauses of the Bill. The first makes it an offence for a man in the street or public place to solicit a woman for the purposes of prostitution whether from a motor vehicle or after having just got out of a motor vehicle. We have tried to make the interpretation of a motor vehicle as wide as possible, so that it does not matter whether a man arrives by car, motor-cycle, van or any other vehicle, providing it is, to use the words of the Road Traffic Act 1972, "adapted for use" in a public place.

A problem arises also if a man accosts a woman for the purpose of prostitution while he is not in a car or other vehicle. Obviously, it would be foolish if, in seeking to deal with kerb crawling, we left out that possibility. There would be a temptation for men to abandon their cars and go on foot, and the cure would be worse than the disease. For that reason, the second offence occurs when a man accosts a woman while in a street or public place.

The third offence is more serious than the first two. The Bill makes it an offence for a man to accost a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear. Let us suppose that a woman is travelling on the underground in London during the evening. She finds that people have got out at other stations and that she is virtually on her own in the carriage, except for a man who proceeds to make passes at her and make sexual suggestions and innuendoes in such a way as to cause her real apprehension and fear.

There are other examples where a woman might be in that position while in a place where, I hasten to add, she has every right as a citizen to be. I do not accept for a moment the suggestion, "A respectable woman would not be in that place at that time of night." A woman should be able to travel and go anywhere without fear of molestation or of being made afraid. Hon. Members will note that the legislation is phrased so as to make the test one of reasonableness, so that a woman who was particularly nervous would not be covered. The test would be whether an ordinary man, or in this case woman, was in circumstances reasonably likely to cause and induce fear.

I suggest—this is also the recommendation of the Criminal Law Revision Committee—that the first two offences should carry fines at level 3 on the standard scale which currently stands at a maximum of £400. The third offence, which I regard as more serious, will carry a maximum fine of £2,000—the highest level fine in a magistrates court. All the offences will be triable summarily. Hon. Members will notice that in no case do I suggest that imprisonment is suitable. Those who know my work in penal affairs will be aware that I regard prison as a place to be used only for violent cases. I believe that, at all costs, one should try to keep people out of prison, so it would be very much out of keeping if I suggested that these three criminal offences should be penalised other than by the imposition of fines.

That is, however, not the case in the second part of the Bill. I recommend increased penalties in cases of attempted rape and indecent assault. Attempted rape can be practically as serious as the offence itself. It may well be, for example, that a woman is on the point of being raped by a man who threatens her life by holding a knife to her in the most horrible circumstances and, by the grace of God, some interruption prevents that offence from being committed. The courts would regard that as extremely serious and, for that reason, I believe that it is important that that offence should carry the same maximum penalty as rape itself—life imprisonment.

That penalty is very much in keeping with the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 which provides that the penalty, at its greatest, should be the same for the attempt as for the actual offence. That measure was left out of the Act, so that the Criminal Law Revision Committee could examine the matter. The committee made that recommendation, and it is therefore included in clause 4.

I shall now consider the other case where I strongly believe there should be increased penalties. At the moment, the legislation dealing with cases of indecent assault is in two stages. If a man assaults a girl under the age of 13, the penalty is five years imprisonment. If a man assaults a girl above that age, the penalty is only two years imprisonment.

Let us consider what indecent assault can involve. It is not a pleasant subject, but it is such a wide-ranging offence that some commentators have suggested that there should be two offences. Under present law, there is only one offence. The offence can range from relatively harmless bottom pinching and groping—another unpleasant term—to actions which, for the woman concerned, are as bad as, if not worse than, rape. It is possible for a man to force a bottle inside a woman's body. It is possible to commit with her an act of buggery—an ugly term for an ugly deed. I suggest that many women would find that to be more painful physically and psychologically than a straightforward case of unlawful sexual intercourse.

Mr. Fairbairn: Surely in England sodomy is a major crime in its own right, whether committed on a man or woman, and whatever the person's age.

Miss Fookes: Yes; but I am saying that the penalties are not sufficiently strong. That is why I suggest in the Bill that the penalty should be increased to 10 years' imprisonment. That has the merit of bringing the penalty into line with the penalty imposed for an indecent attack by one man upon another. It is quite ludicrous to treat the two differently.

As an example, I shall quote a letter from a juror in a case heard in the Manchester Crown court by Judge Prestt. The press cutting accompanying the letter stated:

"Judge Prestt said:

'If a man indecently assaults another man the maximum sentence can be one of five years. But the maximum sentence if he assaults a woman is two years.'

He added: 'It has been said many times before but I repeat here that the maximum sentence for offences of indecent assault on a woman are wholly inadequate.'"

The juror stated:

"the defendant had been found guilty of a prolonged and serious sexual assault against a young woman. I and my fellow jurors at the case were shocked at this blatant example of sexual discrimination, which the judge, the Recorder of Manchester, quite rightly highlighted."

The juror went on to say that since the case she had done her best to bring this to the attention of the authorities. She said that she was extremely pleased about the possible effect of my Sexual Offences Bill.

In 1981, there was a dreadful case of murder in the county of Devon from which I come. In that case a woman holidaymaker had temporarily separated from her family to have a country walk along the coast. She never reached her destination, because she was appallingly sexually assaulted by the man who, to stifle her cries, murdered her. It was revealed that the man had a string of convictions showing what can be described only as an increasing pattern of violence. He had started with indecent exposure and had gone on to indecent assault. He had seriously assaulted a young woman of 18, for which offence he could be given only the maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment. The dreadful murder took place only 13 weeks after his release from prison. That was indecent assault followed by murder.

If society could have broken into that pattern of crime with the imposition of a far more serious sentence for the indecent assault, which was proved, that woman holidaymaker might still be alive today.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend and I have discussed the case to which she has referred. She knows that it was one of the earliest files which I read on coming to the Home Office. I was so distressed by the account given by the trial judge of that case that I felt immediately that it was necessary to change the relevant penalties. That has been the view of an increasing number of judges and it has led to the recommendation of the Criminal Law Revision Committee.

Does my hon. Friend agree that the Devon case demonstrates that, in sentencing for sexual offences, there are two elements that the judge has to take into account? The first element is the gravity of the offence under consideration and the second is the potential of the individual concerned to commit further acts of sexual violence of a sort that require the sentence to reflect the public danger of the man being released early. When the charge is indecent assault, the maximum sentence is two years' imprisonment, whatever the man's potential to commit further sexual offences. With normal remission, the man will leave prison in a comparatively short time, with the consequences of which we are aware. Anyone who argues against increased penalties for indecent assault of the sort that my hon. Friend proposes must deal with that grave consequence.

Miss Fookes: My hon. Friend underlines cogently the argument that I was advancing and I am glad that we are in agreement.

I have referred to all the clauses, apart from those on interpretation and extent.

The Bill deals with some serious matters of public nuisance and violence of the most worrying sort. I do not pretend for an instant that this is a comprehensive Bill that is intended to deal with the entire range of sexual offences and prostitution. It would be tempting to try to do so, for I would like everything to be neat and tidy and in one Act. However, it is obviously beyond the powers of a private Member so to do. We all know the delicate nature of a private Member's Bill and the hurdles that it has to clear. I have deliberately chosen to reduce the scope of what I wish to do, to take in the public nuisance of offences in the street and to deal with two particular inadequacies in the present penalties provided by the law.

I should be delighted if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State were to tell us today that the Government are minded in due course to introduce a Bill to deal with a far wider range of matters. I recognise that it is not possible to stop prostitution and we must take a clear view of where we should be moving in that respect, but I am clear about the need to take the steps that are set out in the Bill. I am not impressed by those who would urge me not to introduce the three new offences because they are worried about the actions of the police. I hope that those who are offended directly will be prepared to give evidence themselves and will not choose to rely on agent provocateur actions on the part of the police. I felt so strongly about this that I discussed the matter with the co-ordinator of a residents' group. He told me that he thought it likely that at least some of those so offended would be prepared to give evidence. I am not looking for prosecutions for all, but some salutary examples would go far in creating a deterrent effect.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): I agree with my hon. Friend about the need to introduce the woman witness rather than to prosecute on the basis of police evidence. It would be possible to write that into the Bill in Committee. Would my hon. Friend look favourably upon that?

Miss Fookes: Like many Ministers, I would not wish to commit myself off the cuff. I should be most willing, however, to consider that possibility. I would need to ensure that any recommendation on those lines was in keeping with other processes in the law. Off the cuff, I am not aware whether my hon. Friend's proposal would infringe them. I would need to be careful before giving a commitment. However, I would be happy to consider my hon. Friend's proposal, as I know that it covers a matter which concerns some of my hon. Friends and, no doubt, some Labour Members.

In conclusion, I offer the Bill as a modest but, I hope, an effective proposition that will go far to deal with the nuisances and the violent crimes which I have outlined. It is in that spirit that I commend it to the House.

10.7 am

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I warmly welcome the Bill and offer my sincerest congratulations to the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on introducing it. She will be giving great hope to women throughout the country who have undoubtedly, as she has said, suffered from the actions of kerb crawlers. She will be giving great hope also to communities such as the one which I represent, where local residents have had to suffer year after year the abuses, threats and noise that arise when an area becomes the haunt of kerb crawlers.

Over the years that I have been a Member of this place I have asked literally hundreds of questions on this issue. I have met Home Office Ministers and I have initiated debates in which I have explained what has happened and is still happening in the part of my constituency that suffers from kerb crawlers and prostitution. Home Office Ministers of successive Governments—indeed, I had a debate on this problem some years ago with the present Home Secretary — have said that we must wait for action. We have been told that the Home Office is fully aware of the problems and the suffering that communities have to face, but we must await the introduction of more modern legislation.

Sadly, the years passed and the local people in my constituency never really believed that anything would happen to start to deal with their problem, which starts in the early afternoon and continues until the early hours of the following morning. Motorists are to be seen driving around for hour after hour looking for prostitutes. As the hon. Member for Drake said, any woman who walks along the streets of some areas — areas which have been invaded by kerb crawlers—will be seen as a potential prostitute. They can be young school girls or elderly ladies who are pensioners. They can be walking home from school or going home from work. I have even been contacted by women to tell me that they have been stopped by motorists when taking their young children out. They have been seen as potential prostitutes. One can understand their disgust. The problem became so bad that residents set up a protest group to try to frighten off both kerb crawlers and prostitutes. Sadly, they were subjected to threats, and their windows were broken by the minders of some of the girls concerned.

The problem became even worse and the Wandsworth police, with whom I have worked on the problem for many years, are fully aware of the nuisance caused. I give them credit for what they have tried to do, but their problem has always been insufficient manpower to allocate enough officers to the areas involved and the lack of modern legislation under which to take action.

The problem exists not just in my constituency but in a large number of areas throughout the country. A few months ago I had an Adjournment debate on this subject, which was answered by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State who is to reply today, and I cited a large number of areas which suffer from this problem. Communities throughout the country have called for action, but, due to the lack of modern legislation, many police forces are reluctant to take action. In the city of Nottingham, however, the problem became so bad that the police were forced by public pressure to take action under a law going back several centuries. As a result, offenders began to appear in court.

I have always believed that any meaningful attempt to tackle the problem requires modern legislation. Neither I nor residents in my area have sought simply to move the problem from one area to another, so that residents now suffering can heave a sigh of relief while residents in an adjoining area start to suffer. I am sure that no hon. Member wants that. That is why it is essential to bring in modern legislation.

Some people have said that, although such a proposal sounds very attractive, there are dangers involved. It is suggested that a person coming into an area which he does not know and genuinely looking for an address may stop someone to ask the way. That has happened to many of us. When I went to north London yesterday with a colleague, I stopped someone to ask for directions. Surely common sense is enough to deal with that aspect. We know that kerb crawlers operate in certain fairly restricted areas. If the local police see someone driving round and round such an area and stopping only to talk to women, common sense should suggest what he is doing. If, when challenged, he claims to be genuinely looking for an address, why should he stop only women? In my view, the person who is genuinely asking for directions has nothing to fear from the proposals. Moreover, I believe that the realistic fines and the consequent publicity will act as a deterrent to the people who, sadly, infest many constituencies and cause problems.

I hope that magistrates will take serious note of the legislation when it becomes law. Magistrates in my area have not always been as helpful as they could be. Representations have undoubtedly been made to them by senior police officers, as often occurs in relation to matters dealt with by magistrates courts, but the help to which we are entitled has not always been forthcoming. I hope that when the Bill becomes law magistrates will pay careful attention to the new provisions and the penalties available.

The Bill is based on the report of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. At long last we have the opportunity to put modern legislation on the statute book, and I greatly welcome that. I hope, too, that there will be no further instances of women police officers pretending to be prostitutes in areas where kerb crawling is a problem. A press report last month carried the following headline:

"Girl Cop's Vice Trap Clean-Up".

It reads as follows:

"Pretty policewoman Jenny Wood went undercover as a 'vice-girl' to clean up one of Britain's most sedate seaside resorts . . . Bournemouth.

The sex trap worked. Kerb-crawlers looking for a good time chatted up the attractive decoy and were promptly arrested."

Police forces in areas in which kerb crawling is a problem should have enough evidence to act without using methods of that kind, and it is quite wrong that they should employ such methods.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was a Minister of State at the Home Office, I put down a series of questions on that issue, as it is not confined to Bournemouth, but he offered no help at all. There was not even any statement of concern. Whatever the question, he merely replied that the way in which police forces were used was not his responsibility.

Mr. Parris: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's dislike of the use of policemen or policewomen as decoys, but even under the Bill I do not see how the police will be able to watch what is going on and stop people if they cannot do so in plain clothes.

Mr. Cox: The use of plain clothes police for observation purposes is quite different from the practice that I have described, which should be a matter of great concern to the House.

I took the point made by the hon. Member for Drake towards the end of her speech. This is a neat and tidy Bill designed to deal with a specific problem. However, on 14 May last year we had a long debate which demonstrated great concern among hon. Members on both sides of the House. The debate was about the actions of police officers with regard to homosexuals and their activities in clubs. I shall not make more difficulties for the Minister by asking him whether some relevant provision could be included in the Bill. However, eight months after that debate we are entitled to be told when the Home Office intends to amend the existing law. Many hon. Members are very concerned about the activities of certain police officers. I cannot believe that police officers who go to certain clubs dressed in a certain way do so only for purposes of observation. We are entitled to know what the Home Office is doing on that matter.

We have already been reminded that prostitution has existed for a long time. I am sure that none of us thinks that we will be able to stop it. However, there are today differing types of prostitution. There is the call-girl system, when the girl operates from her flat. There are the nightclub hostesses who, as part of their job, pick up men and make arrangements with them. If we want to rid our streets of kerb crawlers, we must also consider whether it is time for a change in the law to allow women to advertise their services as prostitutes.

That is very different from licensing brothels. Advertisements in many newspapers leave one in no doubt about the services that are being advertised. It is time that the House and the Home Office — the responsible Department—agreed that if we want action against kerb crawlers we must be realistic and admit that there are people who use the services of prostitutes and consider whether the time is right to give prostitutes an opportunity to advertise their profession.

In recent years there has undoubtedly been a huge growth in prostitution in this country. On 22 November 1984 I received from the Home Office figures for the number of women charged. The figures were for the number of women appearing at the south-western magistrates court in Battersea. In 1982, 203 women were charged with offences relating to prostitution. In 1983 the figure was 476. That is an enormous increase. I suggest that the figures throughout the country are probably similar. I should like to know what surveys are being carried out by the Home Office to try to ascertain the reasons for the increase.

There may be some women who like that life, but I am certain that the vast majority do not. The Borough News is a well respected Wandsworth paper in which the Minister and myself are often mentioned. I hasten to add that we are generally mentioned with approval, as local Members of Parliament. In last week's edition there was a report headed:

"Prostitution 'for sake of children'".

The report referred to a local woman appearing at Marlborough street magistrates court. She said that "she walks the streets for the sake of her children. 'I'm not in the business because I like it . . . I have two children and I do it on odd occasions to make money . . . I gained qualifications, but you just can't get a job in Yorkshire.'"

The woman had previously lived in Yorkshire.

We are entitled to be told whether any studies are being done by the Home Office to try to find out the reasons for the growth in prostitution. This is in no way a political debate. There is wide support for the Bill. But what must be of great concern for us all is the increasing number of youngsters who are turning to prostitution.

I am sure that some other hon. Members saw the television programme entitled "Rent Boys". It was a programme about young boys in Birmingham who were openly soliciting on the streets. They were 14, 15, and 16 years old. It was a sickening programme. I received 30 or 40 letters from constituents who had watched it. Did the Home Office take note of the programme? Has there been any liaison with the Birmingham police to find out what action is being taken in the wake of that programme?

Last December my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) introduced a debate on the proposed changes to the DHSS board and lodging provisions. There is a housing association in Wandsworth, Threshold, which I expect also operates in the Minister's Putney constituency. Threshold has been in touch with me to express concern about the proposed changes to the board and lodging payments made to young people.

During the December debate I read out a letter sent to me by a youngster who was out of work and who was sleeping on local park benches. He had no job, no home and no money. While I wish to see action taken against kerb crawlers, I also want action to stop boys and girls going into prostitution. I hope that the Minister, like the experts who work with young people and who are acquainted with the sad problems caused by unemployment, realises how hard it is for such young people to survive.

This week, no doubt in common with other hon. Members, I received a letter from Shelter commenting on the Government's proposals. According to Shelter, those proposals may mean major cuts in benefit for many people living in board and lodging accommodation. Shelter believes that many could be made homeless, and that young people are especially at risk. I believe that this discussion should be set in a wider context. We should not only be tackling the problem that we know to exist in many areas, but should be doing all that we can to stop young people becoming involved in prostitution.

I am not making a political point, but some of the Government's proposals will put enormous temptations before some youngsters. It is easy to say that they should not fall into temptation, but if they do not know where they will sleep tonight, or whether they will have any money in their pockets tomorrow, temptation is enormously difficult to resist, even for normally rational people. I hope that the Government will conduct a survey and support organisations such as Threshold, which works in my area, Shelter and the Campaign for the Homeless and Rootless, all of which work with young people.

The Bill is long overdue and will therefore be warmly welcomed by many people throughout the country. I hope that both Houses will give it overwhelming support. Discussions that I have had with right hon. and hon. Members show that there is support on both sides of the House. When the Bill becomes law, the hon. Lady will be entitled to the thanks of thousands of people. I shall be the first to salute her efforts. I hope that we are starting, and that in a few months we shall see the conclusion of, something that will make life much more pleasant for many of our constituents.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): I congratulate my hon. and dear Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on her success in the ballot and pay great tribute to her courage in deciding to tackle this thorny and delicate issue.

I am grateful for this opportunity to express my full support for the principle of the Bill, although I must voice a few misgivings and a little disquiet at some of the Bill's substance. My hon. Friend has enormous experience of these matters as she has had to live with them in her constituency. In my salubrious constituency of Cheltenham and in the leafy lanes of Gloucestershire, we are perhaps somewhat closeted from these unpleasant and harsh realities of the urban world of London, Plymouth, Birmingham and other major cities. It would seem that the affliction of kerb crawling, like many other modern social problems, is restricted to a few areas of the country.

I am happy to support the principles of the Bill, although it is a sad indictment of society and a reflection of the recent worsening of the problem that the House should have to debate the matter at all. Clause 4 is in some respects one of the most important. The increase in attempted rape and rape is horrendous, as my hon. Friend said. She has suggested that the deterrents should commend themselves to both sides of the House. The Bill is timely and vital as it deals with the escalating problem of kerb crawling, which the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) has described, even if it is prevalent in only a few areas. It aims to deter men who, through indiscretion and a lack of respect for women, cause a nuisance. There is sufficient evidence to record that kerb crawling induces much fear among women who are not involved and who have no wish to be accosted in the street while going about their ordinary business.

The House has a duty to afford protection to the individual citizen but, when considering kerb crawling, I urge my hon. Friend to recognise the difficulties that legislation of this type might incur and to acknowledge that, irrespective of whether kerb crawling is an offence, the problem will not go away. To use a common phrase, it is the oldest profession in the world. We must achieve a fine balancing act between protecting people who object to such behaviour—I imagine that that includes the vast majority of the nation—and the innocent passer-by who, through no fault of his own, might, as a result of greater suspicion and vigilance by the police, be assumed to be committing an offence when he is not.

There are already numerous laws that give the police considerable powers to control our streets. For the problem of kerb crawling there is legislation going as far back as 1361, as my hon. Friend said. I accepted her contention that that is entirely unsatisfactory. The definitions in the Bill such as, "likely to cause fear" in clause 3 and, "persistently to solicit" in clause 2 are broad, possibly open to distortion and quite likely to bring the law into disrepute if too many errors are made by the police in their anxiety to put the Bill into practice. It should be essential for the case to be proven for the woman who has been offended against to appear in court in connection with the crime. Although I support fully all that has been said, we must ensure that the Bill does not become a blackmailers' charter.

I urge my hon. Friend and the Government to consider the implications that might flow from the enactment of the Bill. I hope that, in Committee, there will be an opportunity to build in some form of protection for the innocent and to ensure that men and women alike are protected. There have been several cases of men suffering gravely from injustices as a result of existing laws. This might be an opportunity to correct that. It is right that, as long as female prostitutes can be charged for soliciting, male kerb crawlers should also be charged, as the offences are almost identical. Moreover, we live in an age of sexual equality. Although I support the intention behind the Bill, I urge that some thought be given to alternative arrangements as a result of kerb crawling being suppressed, because eradication of the problem is utterly unrealistic. I cannot emphasise too strongly the need for safeguards of the innocent.

My hon. Friend produced powerful oratory to explain to the House an unpleasant subject that is often driven under the table or swept under the carpet. There is no doubt that I and the Opposition would find it extremely difficult not to take on board this sensitive and difficult problem. I am happy to give my hon. Friend all my support.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I welcome the aim of the Bill, which is to give welcome protection to women who suffer harassment and fear on the streets. Therefore, I congratulate the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on introducing the Bill. The House knows of her commitment to penal reform and that she would not lightly seek the creation of new offences or harder penalties unless she believed that such a move was both merited and necessary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred to the problem in his constituency. The Bedford hill area covers his constituency and part of mine. Since I first came to the House in 1979, I too have received a continuing stream of complaints about kerb-crawling men from women in the area. Some of the complaints are extremely bitter. I was once told by a mother that her schoolgirl daughter aged 14 was afraid to walk home from school in the afternoons because she was being harassed and hassled by kerb crawlers. I have received millions of complaints about what it is like to walk home on dark afternoons and evenings and to be subjected to such intimidation.

On several occasions I have approached the police about the problem. Wandsworth council is also aware of the problem and is now contriving a complicated traffic scheme to make it more difficult for kerb crawlers to pursue their activities. Obviously, it is more sensible to give the police the powers they need to tackle the problem than to contrive a complicated, costly and illogical traffic scheme to reduce kerb crawling.

I understand that the matter is difficult for the police to deal with. Although some people, including the National Association of Probation Officers, with whom I have been closely associated for many years, believe that the present laws are adequate, I cannot agree. Neither the laws nor the penalties are adequate. It is undesirable that, to tackle a fairly recent problem—recent in terms of the age of the legislation that they are being forced to use—the police should contort powers given to them many years ago. It is undesirable to use in that way powers which were intended for a different purpose. It is therefore right that Parliament should say, "Here is a problem. Let us devise a means by which to tackle it."

Although I am not a lawyer, I understand that some existing powers, such as those for behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace, are inadequate. I was told, for instance, that even if a woman who had been subjected to fear and humiliation by a kerb crawler was able to get the registration number of the motor car, it would be useless the following day because by then, if a breach of the peace had not been demonstrably committed, the motorist could not be brought to court. My knowledge of the law may not be sufficient to develop that point in detail, but from what the police and others have said it is clear that existing laws are inadequate.

Although I agreed with almost every point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, he may not be quite right in his assertion that the incidence of prostitution is increasing. It is true that in the local courts the number of offences connected with prostitution has increased, but that may be partly because of his pressure on the police to take more action, and partly because police activities in the King's Cross area may have forced some prostitutes to move to his constituency and mine.

Mr. Mellor: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman made that point. Most hon. Members are only too happy to take the credit for what they achieve. I was startled when the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) made that point, because if anyone is responsible for an increase in police activities, he is. That has led to more people being brought to court. The hon. Gentleman should congratulate himself on that, rather than say that prostitution has doubled, as I do not believe that there is any basis for believing that it has.

Mr. Dubs: During the past years, I have only rarely agreed with the Minister. On this occasion I am happy to say that I fully agree with him. All credit is due to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting.

Although I fully support the principle and aim of the Bill, I have reservations about its details, some of which have already been discussed by hon. Members. The Bill represents an extension of police powers. Providing that there are the necessary safeguards, there may be nothing wrong in that, but I am not satisfied that there are. I am worried that, under clauses 1, 2 and 3, innocent people could be caught. They may not be looking for prostitutes or kerb crawling, but the police may stop them for reasons of their own. I am not suggesting that the police will do that on a large scale, but we must take note of any further powers that we give the police.

Without adequate safeguards, civil liberties could be eroded, which is not the intention of the hon. Member for Drake. Other hon. Members have mentioned the possibility that the police may use agents provocateurs or decoys to catch kerb-crawling motorists. I am also worried that, as the Bill stands, it will be sufficient to bring a kerb-crawling motorist to court on the evidence of police officers only. That is not enough. I do not like the creation of an offence in which there may not be a victim. Although I fully understand why women and girls who have been subjected to kerb crawling have a natural reluctance to appear in court, it is undesirable that a person should be brought before a court on the evidence of a police officer only. I know that that happens with other offences, but many hon. Members are also worried about that. In court, a female victim should give evidence that she has been subjected to fear, harassment and humiliation through the activities of such a motorist. Therefore, I am unhappy about the way in which the Bill is drawn in that respect.

I now turn to some general points. The law on prostitution is both muddled and hypocritical. Some people regard prostitution as an offence, but I understand that it is not. However, there are many offences connected with it, such as soliciting, running a brothel and living on immoral earnings. Therefore, we should say clearly what we seek to do when we introduce a further measure in this area. I concede that in so far as the law on prostitution is muddled and hypocritical, this Bill is an honest and genuine attempt to make it less so. That is another reason for welcoming it. It is not necessary today to discuss the law on prostitution, nor would it be appropriate, but there may be an opportunity before too long for the House to do so.

We must consider the Bill in the wider context of the values of society. I support anything that is done to lessen the activities of kerb-crawling motorists. However, I must say that in recent years there has been a proliferation of girlie magazines and soft porn on sale freely. Such publications only add to the degradation of women and to the way in which young people are liable to devalue women and to see them as lesser people and as sex objects. If we allow such publications to be sold, it is understandable that some men have an attitude towards women that borders on the contemptuous. I do not like that.

I do not advocate the wholesale censorship of such magazines, because I appreciate that it would be far too difficult. However, at least some of the men who go kerb-crawling do so as a consequence of values in our society which all too often allow women to be degraded in print. It is a widespread and sad problem. Although I cannot suggest how those matters should be tackled—it would not be appropriate to do so this morning—I wish to throw that argument into the discussion because it is relevant to the problem. Having said that, I agree that it does not excuse the activities of kerb-crawlng men, although it may help us to understand the attitudes of some of them.

I am pleased that we are on our way to lessening the extent to which women and girls are subjected to fear, humiliation and degradation on our streets. For the sake of women everywhere, and especially those in my area, I welcome the Bill. I hope that it will be amended in Committee and that some of the reservations expressed by me and other hon. Members will be taken into account. I hope that it will leave the Committee somewhat improved, but in any case I welcome its aims and wish it success.

10.52 am

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I join hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on choosing such an important topic for her private Member's Bill. I am pleased that she has adopted many of the recommendations of the report on prostitution in the street published by the Criminal Law Revision Committee last August. I share her concern. The city of Nottingham has been plagued by kerb crawlers for many years. The worst area is Hyson green, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles). I have been asked by my hon. Friend, who regrettably is unable to be here today, to inform the House that he gives his unqualified support to the Bill.

Nottingham has suffered greatly from the features associated with prostitution, such as kerb crawling and the harassment of women, and I have received many letters of complaint from constituents. The matter came to a head in 1983 when the headmistress of Nottingham high school for girls complained of harassment of her pupils. No respectable woman between the ages of 16 and 65 could walk from one end of Hyson green to the other without blushing. As a result, the Nottinghamshire police, at the end of 1983 and into 1984, mounted a successful campaign in Nottingham to try to clean up the area.

However, the need for new legislation became obvious when kerb-crawling offenders could only be prosecuted under the ancient Justices of the Peace Act 1361, a piece of legislation that is more than 600 years old. The only powers available to the police under the Act were that offenders could be bound over to keep the peace. Previous legislation such as the Street Offences Act 1959 did for a short time rid the streets of the nuisance caused by prostitutes plying their trade. But the nature of the trade made it likely that the nuisance would start again. Prostitutes can be stopped from plying their trade in an area only if it is kept under observation by the police and arrests are made when offences have been committed.

So effective was the campaign in Nottingham that over a few months the problem dwindled. Indeed, so effective was the clampdown that any self-respecting Member of Parliament would rather risk a speeding fine while driving through the area than to dawdle through and be suspected of kerb crawling. Regrettably, however, the advent of the miners' strike in March 1984 meant that forces had to be deployed in maintaining the peace elsewhere, and the campaign had to stop. It is interesting to note that since the police have been absent the problem has returned.

One or two hon. Members have expressed concern that the police may be used to induce the crime of kerb crawling. I share their concern, but when my hon. Friend the Member for Drake comes to consider the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) and others I hope that she will bear in mind the fact that in this case a crime has been committed before an approach is made and, as such, the police officer cannot be accused of inducing the crime.

Even in Nottingham, where the police have been most vigilant in dealing with the problem, the streets are not free of prostitutes. If one way for prostitutes to find clients is denied or made difficult by the law, they will look for another way. If they cannot solicit in the streets in one area, they move to another and their clients follow them. The resources of the police in terms of officers and money make it impracticable for constant observation to be kept everywhere all the time. The more widely such an area is known, the more it will attract prostitutes and clients, and the more nuisance they will create.

It is the nuisance that is the problem, and it is the nuisance that the Bill will go a long way to solving. Kerb crawling seems to have become one of the worst nuisances. A survey in a residential area of 345 women showed that 222 had been accosted by kerb crawlers—30 once, 119 occasionally and 73 often. Those who live and work in such areas expect the law to protect them and their children from the nuisances which occur, and so it should. Some parts of towns and cities are almost no-go areas for women, who are harassed and embarrassed by the unwelcome attentions of men searching for prostitutes by kerb crawling.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Drake said, the Criminal Law Revision Committee recommended that it should be an offence for a man to use a motor vehicle in a street or public place for the purpose of soliciting a woman for prostitution. I was pleased to discover that the Bill not only does that, but makes it an offence for a man to solicit women, or the same woman, persistently in a street or public place, and makes it an offence for a man to solicit a woman for sexual purposes where she is likely to be put in fear.

The persistence clause is essential. The policy advisory sub-committee of the Criminal Law Revision Committee agreed that soliciting by a woman for prostitution would have to be persistent to constitute an offence, although that is perhaps already covered in the criminal law. With regard to men, the working party on vagrancy and street offences noted that it was important to act when a woman was accosted by a man in a public place, although it has always been unclear whether the present law penalises the man who persistently solicits a woman or women in a public place for sexual purposes. This legislation clarifies the position.

Penalties are important, and I am pleased that the Bill has extended those suggested by the Criminal Law Revision Committee and has taken in its proposal that the offences should be triable in a magistrates court. The offences and penalties will make it much easier for the police to prosecute, and the Nottinghamshire constabulary welcomes the Bill. As we have seen in Nottingham, the publicity afforded to men tried for such offences will be an even greater deterrent than the prospect of fines. The last thing a man who harasses women will want is his family and neighbours reading about it in the local press.

Although the major problem is that faced by women, it must not be forgotten that noise, quarrelling and sometimes violence, to say nothing of the build-up of cars crawling along, all have a deteriorating effect on the environment.

It is interesting to note that several so-called civil liberties groups oppose the Bill for some peculiar reason. As the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. [illegible]s) said, the National Association of Probation Officers at its annual meeting in 1984 passed a resolution to resist any legislation seeking to control kerb crawling by the creation of new offences in the criminal law. In my constituency, the National Council for Civil Liberties criticised the Nottingham city vice squad's action against kerb crawlers. That shows how uncertain the civil liberties lobby has become, and I have no hesitation in rejecting its absurd points and in giving my full backing to the Bill, which will help to alleviate a fast-growing and intolerable problem that has infested our cities.

11 am

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on introducing the Bill and on the way in which she presented it to the House. She is taking on a difficult issue and is dealing with it in her usual courageous way.

Working with her on the all-party penal policy group, I often find myself in agreement with her. However, on this occasion she is swimming against the tide in her party. That is a pity, but she is making an impressive struggle and I admire her efforts.

While the Opposition will not oppose the Bill today, I must express some anxieties. I am sure that the hon. Lady will take them on board for consideration in Committee, for she will agree that in this, as in many other parts of the criminal law, it is easy to set out with one intention, only to find one's efforts resulting in some unintended consequences.

Hon. Members will have such dangers in mind, many examples of which appear in the criminal law. The suspended sentence was perhaps the best example of an unintended consequence of legislation; it was designed to reduce the prison population, but in fact helped to increase it. It is important, therefore, for the House to be wary when handling issues such as this.

It is clear that a problem exists over kerb crawling and the harassment of women. People of all political persuasions agree that women should be given some protection from such harassment, and I agree, but Parliament must tread warily when dealing with aspects of sexual behaviour. Sexual behaviour, perhaps more than any other type of behaviour, leads to judgments by society involving double standards, which unfortunately usually redound to the disadvantage of women.

The expectations imposed on women in relation to their sexual behaviour are different from those that men accept for themselves. That has led to the belief that women get treated less equally in society, and there is substantial evidence for that belief.

The hon. Member for Drake dealt effectively with the difficult problem of dealing with sexual behaviour in society generally. This is a subject about which society does not like to talk and would rather brush it under the carpet. The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving) pointed out that it was easier to ignore the inconsistencies and double standards, or not to talk about them, simply because they were regarded as nasty, dirty or unpleasant. Some of society's worst hang-ups arise from the need to talk about sexual behaviour, and that applies whether the subject is discussed privately or in public.

Those who oppose the Bill should remember the important point that the hon. Member for Drake made about the right of women to go anywhere that a man can go at any time. We cast our minds back to the sad case of a woman who was raped when hitch-hiking and of whom the comment was made in court that it was a risk that she had to accept if she wanted to hitch-hike.

I have hitch-hiked many times. I regard it as a legitimate activity, and if it is legitimate for me, it should be legitimate for everyone. That should apply regardless of sexual identity. The hon. Lady was on strong ground in making that point, and anybody with anxieties about the Bill should bear it in mind.

The harassment of women is not new and I suspect that it will not quickly disappear. It is clear, however, that in modern times women are more willing to do something about it — to organise and press for change — and I welcome that.

The hon. Member for Cheltenham described prostitution as the oldest profession in history. He is probably right, but I suggest that it is closely followed by the professions of politics, journalism and law, and I cannot help but feel that the one begat the other three. One day when I give up my present profession I might attempt to elaborate that theory in more detail.

Mr. Irving: The hon. Gentleman, having associated such distinguished professional people with prostitution, might care to remind the House of the relationship. I have never found it.

Mr. Soley: It boils down, in great simplicity, to the fact that behaviour of this type disturbs society, that society tries to impose laws to deal with it, that the laws are debated by politicians and that journalists love stories about this type of subject.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) dealt with the attitude of the press to this and similar issues and the newspaper extract that he read showed how badly the press can handle the subject of sex and violence. I get angry about it. Only the other day I was asked to make a statement, and it was clear that I was expected to express shock, horror, disgust and anger about sexually-motivated violent offences.

The press, local and national, should adopt a more responsible attitude when dealing with the problems of sex and violence in society. They handle them badly. They use the subject in a way that plays up to the prejudices of the lowest common denominator. I fear that they use the whole issue as a means of selling newspapers, rather than as an important part of society, and in turn, as I said, society tends to adopt double standards and duck the difficult issues involved. I should be happier if newspapers recognised their responsibility and responded more effectively than they do at present.

Whether or not prostitution is the oldest profession in any market based economy — and, let us face it, all economies are market based to some extent — women have the option of selling their bodies as a marketable commodity, and we should never underestimate the importance of economics in prostitution. I shall elaborate on that because I have spent many years dealing with the issues involved when prostitutes have come before the courts.

Many attempts have been made to understand prostitution and soliciting in psychiatric and sociological terms. I am not opposed to dealing with the matter in that way, and there are psychological and sociological explanations for that type of behaviour. As I say, nobody should underestimate the economic aspects of it. Indeed, in times of slump I would expect the number of people involved in soliciting to increase.

The Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) were right to say that the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting pushed up the number of police recorded incidents in that area. I have no doubt that that was the case. Nevertheless, I should be greatly surprised if a dramatic increase in the amount of soliciting did not occur in slump conditions.

A saying originated from an excellent article in New Society many years ago. It was that human beings were not just chained infantile savages of psychoanalytic theory, nor brighter than average rats of learning theory, but that they were beings who responded to their social and economic environment. We must remember that that response is constantly changing because they themselves change the environment in which they live.

The important point there is that increasingly we find that women who fall on difficult economic times—for example, to meet household bills for rent, electricity and gas, especially when they are in danger of being cut off—go on to the streets to earn money to pay those bills. I have many cases that I could quote to the House of such problems.

The issue becomes particularly difficult because, if one wants to deal with the problem of prostitution, it is no good simply pushing it off the streets. It will not go away, as the hon. Member for Cheltenham said, and we have to recognise that an economic factor is involved. In a number of cases to which I could refer, when we have resolved the economic problems, the need to go out soliciting has ended. A clear economic link, as well as other factors, may be involved in individual cases.

The second part of this matter is something that is not always understood, which is that prostitution is not an offence. Soliciting is an offence, and this highlights the problem which the hon. Member for Drake has taken on board in the Bill. Given that prostitution is not an offence, it is important to recognise that the problem is the consequence of soliciting. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting vividly described these consequences, which have affected his constituency, and the problem is particularly acute when it focuses on one area so that the problems for the local community increase. I have in mind the problems of car doors slamming, of threats, of women walking home at night being accosted and the fear that people have for their children, whether rational or irrational. All those problems arise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting talked about decriminalisation, and that is an important factor. I should like the Government to concentrate on dealing with the problem of the presentation on the streets. In doing so we would deal with many of the problems about which the hon. Member for Drake is rightly concerned.

I gave evidence to the Criminal Law Revision Committee and I tried to urge it to look at this problem. I have always been troubled by our tendency to try to expand the imprint of the law. Whenever we are faced with a social problem, somehow or other we think that the answer lies in the criminal law being extended. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) criticised the civil liberties groups and the National Association of Probation Officers, but I would have taken his criticisms a little better if he had given reasons for saying why they were wrong. It troubles me that he gave no reasons, because he is falling into the trap of saying that this is unpopular, therefore he does not like it and it must be banned, and civil liberties do not enter the matter. Civil liberties do come into the matter, because they are important, and to get the balance right is difficult. To dismiss them as being of no consequence is to insult not only the groups involved but the House.

Mr. Ottaway: The criticism of the National Council for Civil Liberties was made without any foundation, as was consequently recognised when the local section of the NCCL openly disagreed with the national council. There are two sides to this matter.

Mr. Soley: I recognise that there are two sides to the problem. I was asking the hon. Gentleman, when attacking such a group, at least to give reasons for doing so. The fact that there was disagreement between the groups does not trouble me. However, if we are to criticise the civil liberties lobby, we should give our reasons for doing so. Recently, it has been too easy simply to criticise the civil liberties argument. As I have said on a number of other occasions, and recently in a journal, this country has allowed its civil liberties base to be dangerously eroded. That is why I do not like that style of argument. Although this is a personal point to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, I am not saying that he is ignorant of the problem. However, if he wants to pursue the argument, he must at least give the House reasons.

We need eventually to work out a solution to this problem by allowing prostitution to take place in a way that does not impinge on other people, and the decriminalising argument is a strong one, although I know that there are difficulties to it. When I gave evidence to the committee, I was aware that there were some weaknesses in my argument. If we decriminalise, it allows women, either individually or in groups, to work from premises, which means that they do not come into conflict with the law by advertising or soliciting. However, this does not answer one of the problems—that of a woman doing it as a short-term economic expedient.

For example, around the King's Cross are a there was recently an outbreak of soliciting. There were a number of women coming down from Birmingham on the train to King's Cross and soliciting in that area as it was comparatively easy to earn enough in one night to pay the fare home, and have some money left over to meet emergency household bills. If someone is soliciting for emergency economic reasons—to pay the rent or gas or electricity bills—she is not likely, unless she has the contacts, to set herself up in accommodation. Such women are likely to be working away from the home base because they do not want to be embarrassed by publicity in the local press. They do not want their partner or husband and children to know about it. The economic aspect spills over and affects some of the solutions to the problems.

I put it to the committee that it should have considered giving local authorities greater powers in defined ways. In the early hours of this morning, the Committee on the Local Government Bill was busy abolishing some of the powers of the GLC and the metropolitan county councils. Instead of doing that, we should be considering ways in which to extend the powers of local authorities to deal with the particular problems in their areas. I should be prepared to consider sympathetically some of the experiments that have been tried successfully in other areas where premises are licensed.

At this stage I should not be convinced by an argument for Government-sponsored licensed premises, although there may be a case for them. It would be useful to recognise that in certain areas that is a possible solution, but that it might be better for the local authority to decide whether to use that solution in its area. After all, that is the body most affected by this problem. Some local authorities in the south of England have considered this solution. It is interesting that it is being considered on cross-party lines. It is not predominantly a Labour solution; if anything, it is being considered more by Conservative local authorities.

Another matter that concerns me in the Bill has been raised on a number of occasions, and I hope that the hon. Member for Drake will take this on board, because it is vital. It is the victimless crime argument. It is profoundly dangerous, and one of the weakest parts of the law, that the person is brought before the court on the evidence of a police officer, without an independent witness to confirm what is alleged. This brings the law into disrepute. Time and again I have seen prostitutes in magistrates courts saying that the case had been set up. Whether or not it was, the argument is weak when nobody is prepared to say who it was who complained about the behaviour.

When I gave evidence to the Criminal Law Revision Committee, it was put to me that it would be embarrassing for a man in a public position who had to walk between groups of prostitutes soliciting in the streets to make a complaint and appear before the court. My argument is that that person, male or female, must be prepared to go before a court, or must be prepared to cope with what might be an embarrassing and difficult social circumstance, but not one in which he or she can hide from the consequences of his or her own behaviour.

Mr. Fairbairn: I have heard some astonishing things about the law of England this morning, but is the hon. Gentleman saying that in England a person can be convicted on the say-so of a policeman, without witnesses giving evidence on oath?

Mr. Soley: Yes. I have great respect for the Scottish law, having lived in Scotland for many years, and it has much to teach the English law. However, the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) must know that a prostitute can be convicted in such a way. This is the first time that I have taught a lawyer the law. A prostitute can be brought before a court for soliciting, without a witness confirming her behaviour. That has always troubled me deeply, as it has the hon. Member for Drake.

One of the clauses refers to "persistent" soliciting. The Criminal Law Revision Committee has considered the matter carefully, and it is dangerous to allow conviction without a witness. If a big police presence is in an area, people might be caught in a dragnet operation and the danger is that the problem will simply be transferred to another area. I understand that that is what happened at Nottingham and King's Cross.

There is a major problem, and the hon. Lady should be careful because she could achieve the opposite of what she has set out to achieve. We should reduce the impact of the law in certain areas and to recognise that we must step back a little and not come down too heavily on people. The hon. Lady does not propose that prison should be used as a sentence in this respect, but many people are sent to prison for the non-payment of fines. That is another worry expressed outside the House. It is extremely important that a complaint should have been made.

I emphasise the danger of trying to deal with social problems by extending the imprint of the law. Perhaps the fear of this being another sus law is exaggerated, but that danger is feared by many people. We must watch that carefully if the Bill becomes an Act. I am sure that the hon. Lady would be the first to agree that that should not happen. We shall have to monitor the matter carefully and ensure that it does not have the undesirable side effects that some people fear.

I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us that the police will not use agents provocateurs. I am thinking about kerb crawling, male homosexuality, with which the Bill does not deal, and soliciting for male prostitutes. Incredible double standards are sometimes applied. The whole ball game is reversed. Male prostitutes are often in a worse position than female prostitutes. Entrapment is a danger. The Home Office must give clear guidance about acceptable methods of policing, because the police could easily come into disrepute. There is no advantage in the agent provocateur approach to trap either female or male prostitutes. That is profoundly dangerous and undesirable. It damages the image of the police, and we should not encourage it.

The question of attempted rape is dealt with at the end of the Bill. Rape and attempted rape are violent offences. The problem is that we have not recognised them as such and have tended to regard them as something in between. Rape and attempted rape are sexual offences, but they are acts of violence.

About three years ago a useful book was published, under the auspices of the Howard League, on the concept of dangerousness. It had some interesting things to say about how society should deal with dangerous offenders. It dealt with the dangers of double standards in penal policy. It talked about dangerous individuals and dangerous organisations which can seriously pollute the environment or risk people's lives, by avoiding safety legislation, for instance. The book also said that it was difficult to predict with certainty who would and who would not repeat an offence. Predictions by probation officers, psychiatrists, psychologists and sociologists are no better and no worse than the average insurance actuary's assessment. That does not surprise me, because our knowledge of human behaviour is very limited.

The hon. Member for Drake proposes life sentences. That allows flexibility, and I prefer that to increasing the number of years of a sentence. I agree that prison should be used for those who are dangerous and violent. Over the years we have constantly upped the pyramid of sentencing. I believe that for offences which do not involve violence or the threat of it sentences are often too long.

The deterrent factor does not make sense in terms of a sentence of five or 10 years. The average person who thinks about the consequences of his offence will not think, "I am worried about five years, but I do not like the sound of 10 years." People do not think like that. They assess the chances of being caught, and if the sentence and the public embarrassment are sufficient, they will be deterred. Research backs up that argument.

In about 70 per cent. of cases involving violence, including sexual offences such as rape and attempted rape, alcohol plays a part. Alcohol is a major factor and we ignore that at our peril.

We should attempt to reduce the maximum lengths of sentences. I agree with what the Dutch Government are doing. They have similar problems to ours and their maximum sentence is about 12 years, but the life sentence remains. The life sentence allows flexibility.

Mr. Fairbairn: In my experience, which may be modest in criminal matters, the only effect of the number of years imprisonment announced in court is that the accused will gasp if the sentence is longer than he expected and not gasp if it is shorter.

Mr. Soley: I shall not comment on that. We must recognise that rape and attempted rape are violent offences. Rape is not some minor offence. I welcome a number of the moves made by the police, but we need to go further in terms of our handling of rape cases. This point has recently been taken on board and progress is being made.

This is an important matter. I hope that the hon. Member for Drake will give careful consideration to a number of the points that have been made about the Bill. The victimless of this crime is the point that is most important to me. I hope that the Bill will have the effect that the hon. Lady intends it to have.

11.30 am

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): First, I apologise to the House for the fact that if I am to be in Bakewell, where I must be, by 5.30 this evening, I may have to leave the House before the end of the debate.

It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). I know that he has studied these matters in great depth and in a most thoughtful way for many years. He has given evidence to the Criminal Law Revision Committee. This morning the hon. Gentleman has said much of what I planned to say but some of it will, I believe, bear repetition.

May I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) upon her good fortune in being selected to present her private Member's Bill. She gave me the very greatest assistance when, together with other hon. Friends, I successfully attempted to remove the custodial sentence from the crime of prostitution. My hon. Friend was an enormous source of support at that time, so I know that in the best sense of the word she is liberal and that the Bill is presented with the highest of motives. Nevertheless, I have grave misgivings about the Bill, with which I shall deal in a little more detail in a minute or two.

First, it is worth saying that for many thousands of years women have been prepared to sell their bodies and that men have been prepared to pay for them. It is most unlikely that this or any other legislation will banish the trade. As in any other area of the market, prohibitive legislation can sometimes suppress and can always distort. It is most likely that, if this legislation is successful, it will succeed in distorting the market. In other words, it will cause prostitution to take place in ways and in places other than those where it takes place now. However, it is unlikely to banish prostitution. Indeed, that is not the purpose of my hon. Friend's Bill.

When the Criminal Law Revision Committee looked into this matter it made very much the same point:

> "However much the public may disapprove of the prostitute, the law, we think, must always remember the human nature of prostitutes. They have to have somewhere to live and if they are not to outrage decency by following their trade in public they must have somewhere to carry it on."

The problem about the Bill is that it makes it more difficult for a prostitute to carry on her trade on the street without making it any easier for her to carry on her trade elsewhere.

In its provisional recommendations, the Criminal Law Revision Committee made some helpful proposals which unfortunately have not been incorporated into this measure and upon which the Government do not envisage legislation. One of the committee's proposals was that, whereas at present if two people operate as prostitutes from single premises that will be defined as a brothel, two women, no more, might be able to operate from single premises and this would not be defined as a brothel. The nature of a prostitute's work is inherently dangerous. The committee explained that there would be security in two women working together. There would also be mutual assistance in the care and raising of children. If, in the way suggested by the Criminal Law Revision Committee, we could make it easier for prostitutes to work off the streets and if, as the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) suggested, we allowed prostitutes to advertise in a limited way, we should be more justified in cracking down in a more draconian manner upon the kind of prostitution that takes place on the streets.

My misgiving about my hon. Friend's Bill is that it simply extracts from the proposals of the Criminal Law Revision Committee one of what might be called the illiberal suggestions without adding to it the counter-balancing liberal suggestions that the committee was also able to put forward. My hon. Friend suggested that it would be impossible for a private Member to enact through private Member's legislation a comprehensive Bill dealing with prostitution generally. I am afraid that she is absolutely right. Unfortunately, when one goes to Ministers and asks what are the prospects for a comprehensive Bill from the Government, they reply that this kind of legislation is better enacted my means of private Member's legislation and that unless a private Member is prepared to introduce such a Bill it is unlikely that the Government will find time for such legislation.

Mr. Mellor: I decided that it would be courteous to my colleagues not to intervene until all hon. Members had made their speeches, but it may be that that will deprive my hon. Friend of the pleasure of hearing what I have to say, since he will be on his way to Bakewell. Therefore, may I make the point to him that, if the ladies of Bakewell were unable to walk down Bakewell high street in the evening without being accosted from cars by gentlemen who believed that Bakewell was the red light district of Derbyshire and who therefore had come there from all over the county, I do not believe that my hon. Friend would be saying that we should wait for a general reform of the law of prostitution.

As long ago as 1976, the Home Office under the then Government, for reasons that I do not criticise, laid on one side proposals to deal specifically with the problem of kerb crawling in order to enable it to have a major investigation of the law relating to sexual offences. The recommendations relating to the law on prostitution were published only in August 1984. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members who have spoken in the debate had very clear views about what that law should be, but they would not necessarily be views that would commend themselves to every hon. Member—nor, indeed, to every group that is capable of whipping up a hum in the community about what this Government should or should not do.

Therefore, we are faced with a simple choice: either we support action to deal with a very serious problem in some areas, for which at present there is no legal redress, or we wait tomorrow, tomorrow and tomorrow for generalised reform. My hon. Friend can look at this problem with the cool logic that I in particular enjoy, because this problem is removed from his doorstep, but it is not removed from the doorstep of the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox). And his doorstep is not too far away from mine. That is why we made the judgment that we have.

Mr. Parris: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. A general revision of the law on prostitution could not possibly be effected through private Member's legislation. It must be effected by Government. It may take a little while until Government can bring that about. I await his assurance — and I shall be glad to sit down for a moment if my hon. Friend is able to give it to me—that the Government envisage a general review of the law on prostitution, as outlined in the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. Does my hon. Friend wish to interrupt me?

Mr. Mellor: I am always happy to interrupt my hon. Friend. We have interrupted each other many times over the last few years. The Criminal Law Revision Committee has considered the matter and published its report. That report is being studied by the Government. The question whether it is appropriate to legislate upon it in the short, medium or long term must depend upon the response to it and upon whether or not there is a general feeling in the House and elsewhere that the proposals would be an appropriate step forward. Given that it took some nine years for those proposals to emerge—I do not criticise that, because it is an extremely difficult area—I do not believe that we shall be able to reach a view upon this matter in the short term.

If, as I have already pointed out, all hon. Members could be guaranteed to take the view that my hon. Friend takes on these matters, my life would be a good deal easier, but my hon. Friend, as an intellectually honest and rigorous person, knows full well that he represents only one wing of the argument and that there are others who would have something to say if I were to announce that the Government will legislate immediately in precisely the form that my hon. Friend would wish.

Mr. Parris: With respect, I do not agree with my hon. Friend. It did take nine years for these proposals to be formulated, but it took only nine weeks for my hon. Friend's Bill to be formulated and I believe that she will have no trouble in getting it through the House. I think, too, that my hon. Friend and his right hon. and learned Friend would have no trouble in getting a Bill through the House if it were based upon the overall proposals of the Criminal Law Revision Committee for reform of the law on prostitution. It may take my hon. Friend a few months to do that. If I was confident that he planned to do that in a few months, or if I was confident that he planned to do it in a few years, I should be happier about my hon. Friend's Bill. I believe—I am going to stick my neck out on this—that my hon. Friend and his right hon. and learned Friend have no intention of introducing into this Parliament legislation based upon the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. That explains some of my misgivings about proceeding only upon some of the more illiberal proposals of the committee.

I do not intend to oppose the Bill; I think that I support it, especially in the light of assurances given——

Mr. Mellor rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The Minister may be seeking to catch my eye later. I hope that he will bear in mind that he can answer some of the points then.

Mr. Mellor: I bear in mind that my hon. Friend told me that he probably would not be here at that point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House cannot have a debate within a debate on the assumption that an hon. Member will leave the House.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend has given way to me and I shall be brief. I shall seek not to interrupt again, but the point about future changes in the law of prostitution is important.

I have been rightly reminded that I should have said earlier that, as a result of a request that I made to the committee, it expedited its consideration of prostitution in the street and published its report in August 1984. It has not concluded its consideration and published its final report on the remaining aspects of prostitution. Therefore, it comes a little hard that we should be criticised for not taking action on it.

Whether action should be taken depends on the response to the document. When it should be taken depends on the difficult consideration of the priorities of the Home Office. As my hon. Friend well knows, any number of points are floating around on which we have given commitments to legislate, such as animal experiments and criminal justice. It will be a little hard to push those on one side because of this matter.

Mr. Parris: I am grateful for your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I find it flattering——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am seeking to protect not the hon. Gentleman, but other hon. Members are waiting to take part in the debate and those others have Bills which they hope will be brought before the House.

Mr. Parris: I find it flattering that a Minister is on the Front Bench and listening to what I say, which is not always the case.

I do not believe that the Government have any plans to legislate on this matter and I shall be surprised if there were legislation before the next general election. I rather doubt whether there will be legislation after it.

It is worth looking at the history of the Criminal Law Revision Committee's consideration of the matter. Hon. Members have implied that the Committee's recommendations were unanimous and wholehearted that it was perfectly content with them, if not enthusiastic. That is not a correct reading of the minds or deliberations of the committee's members. From the working paper which was published in 1982, I got the impression that the committee members were doubtful about the efficacy of legislation on kerb crawling and had serious misgivings about whether such legislation would be effective.

Paragraph 3.43 on page 33 of the report says:

"We all agree that the kinds of conduct to which the Policy Advisory Committee"— that is a sort of cat's paw for the Home Secretary—

"have referred are socially undesirable and should be brought within the ambit of the criminal law if it is possible to do so without creating offences which are so difficult to prove that they are seldom, if ever, charged, or putting members of the public to the inconvenience or embarrassment of giving evidence, or extending the law too widely, or allowing police officers to give evidence about other people's reaction to a situation."

The members of the committee, rather significantly, go on to say:

"Each of the suggested offences seems to have one or more of these elements. The police, for example, would be unlikely to obtain any evidence in a case in which a man accosted a prostitute for the purposes of prostitution."

They conclude:

"Anyway, some of us are of the opinion that it would be undesirable for police officers to give evidence about the effect of an accused's conduct on a third party not called as a witness."

I gained the impression from those remarks that the committee members had been asked to frame proposals for legislation on kerb crawling and that they were in serious doubt as to whether effective proposals, which were not undesirable from the point of view of police powers, could be so framed.

I also got the impression that the Policy Advisory Committee sent them back to their books and told them to jolly well come up with proposals of one kind or another, and they jolly well have. But I do not get the impression from what they say that they are entirely happy about those proposals. I am willing to be interrupted or corrected, but perhaps it had better not be my hon. Friend the Minister.

It would be most useful at this stage to go through some of the proposals in the Bill. If the House feels that I am making points that are better made in Committee, I can only say in my defence that as presently drafted the Bill is not workable and should not go into Committee at all. The Bill could be greatly improved in Committee, and if it is it will deserve a Second and a Third Reading. Therefore, the points that I am making are not just technical or Committee points, but serious points about the mainspring of the Bill—its efficacy.

Mr. Fairbairn: Can my hon. Friend confirm or refute the allegation by my hon. Friend the Minister that in England there is no penalty for breach of the peace?

Mr. Parris: I would never refute anything said by a Minister. If that is what my hon. Friend says, it must be true. That is unsatisfactory. Perhaps we should be looking at the general law on breach of the peace rather than piecemeal legislation on sexual offences.

Clause 1 says:

"It is an offence for a man to solicit a woman for the purpose of prostitution if he does so—

(a) from a motor vehicle while it is in a street or public place; or"— this is the point with which I want to deal at the moment—

"(b) in a street or public place while in the immediate vicinity of a motor vehicle that he has just got out of or off."

That will have to go. I do not know what means. Is it 20, 50 or 100 yd? Case law will soon establish that, and people will make sure that they are at least that distance away from their motor vehicle before they solicit.

"in the immediate vicinity of a motor vehicle"

What does having

"just got out of or off"

a motor vehicle mean? Should one count to 10 before soliciting, or to 20 or 30? Again, case law will establish that and people will take care that they have not just got out of or off a vehicle and that they are not in the vicinity of it. The Bill would be stronger for the simple excision of that subsection.

Paragraph (a) deals with soliciting a woman

"from a motor vehicle while it is in a street or a public place".

That brings with it serious problems of evidence. From whom shall we obtain the evidence that the solicitation took place? We shall not obtain it from a prostitute; that is fairly clear. Shall we be able to obtain the evidence from an innocent woman who has been solicited in the mistaken belief that she is a prostitute? I hope, like other hon. Members, that we could, but the Criminal Law Revision Committee felt doubtful about the chances of persuading many women to come before the courts and complain that they had been accosted from a motor vehicle. I am no barrister, but they are not under-represented in this Chamber. If they turn their minds to how as defence counsel they might conduct the cross-examination of such a witness, they would see why women would soon be rather unwilling to volunteer to give evidence in such cases. I am not sure that it will be easy to persuade innocent women to give evidence and I know that it will not be possible to persuade prostitutes to give evidence.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am as terrified, Mr. Deputy Speaker, of interrupting my hon. Friend too frequently as the prospective witness is terrified. If the Government successfully introduce into England the sanity of a system of prosecution which is not engineered by police according to the legislative programme, will that prosecution system still have the same fantasy—this idea was introduced to me this morning; I did not know of it previously—of policemen acting as witnesses and telling us what the evidence of someone who has not been called would have been if he had been called?

Mr. Parris: I need not respond at this stage, because my hon. and learned Friend has outlined the underlying theme of my misgivings about the Bill as drafted.

How will we obtain evidence that someone has solicited from a car? I know that we will not obtain the evidence from the prostitute and I think that we will not obtain it from the innocent woman. The evidence could be obtained in two ways. First, decoys or agents provocateurs could be used, and that would be the easiest way of obtaining the evidence. A plain-clothes policewoman who has been solicited will have no doubt in her mind about what happened and will not show vagueness in her evidence. It will therefore be easy to persuade the court that solicitation has taken place.

There are many reasons why we do not want policewomen to be used as decoys. The Criminal Law Revision Committee believes that the practice is widespread in the United States, but the committee would not like the practice ever to become widespread in Britain. No one wants policewomen to be used as decoys in that way, but I believe that it is perhaps the only straightforward way of obtaining evidence about a person soliciting from a motor vehicle.

The second way of obtaining evidence was touched on by the hon. Member for Tooting. I agreed with much of his speech. He said that the police could observe either when in plain clothes or from a position from which they could not be seen. Observation could be kept in an area known to be frequented by prostitutes and kerb crawlers. The police could watch kerb crawlers stop and solicit a prostitute. The police evidence would be that the woman was a known prostitute, that the car had been seen to be kerb crawling and that it was an area in which this type of solicitation occurred.

I believe that many hon. Members while travelling in a town they do not know have stopped and asked directions from a woman. I usually ask women because men generally do not know where places are. Women always give good directions. I have no doubt that at some stage I have asked directions of a woman who was a prostitute. That is likely to happen. It may well be that, under this legislation, a policeman will be in the area observing. He will tell the court that he had been in an area known for being frequented by prostitutes, that the woman involved was a common prostitute and that the accused slowed down, leaned out of the car window and said something to the woman. The policeman would have to say that "something" had been said because he was not close enough to overhear. Only a policewoman acting as decoy would be able to hear what was said. Obviously, the communication would cease immediately if a uniformed policeman got too close.

There is a genuine possibility that mistakes will be made. Even if we take a robust view about the likelihood of this happening, those accused under this clause will always have the defence that they were travelling slowly around the block looking for a cigarette machine that was full or for someone to give directions. Although one may be inclined not to believe that argument, it is difficult to state beyond all reasonable doubt that it is not a good defence. It will be difficult to enforce this clause, unless decoys are used.

Mr. Fairbairn: I believe that another type of evidence is infinitely more likely to be used, particularly with this extraordinary practice of using second-hand evidence given through the mouths of policemen. That other type of evidence is completely false evidence. A complaint may be made about kerb crawling in a certain area, so the problem is cleared up. How is that done? False evidence is given against half a dozen people and that evidence is reported in the press.

Mr. Parris: That point was best made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith, who said that false evidence may or may not be given. No one will ever know whether the evidence was false. There will never be enough ways of checking the veracity of the evidence. Rather than say that I believe that the police will often falsify evidence, I shall restrict myself to saying that many people will often believe that the police will falsify evidence. I do not believe that it is wise, through legislation of this type, to encourage that belief.

A woman prosecuted for soliciting must previously have been formally cautioned three times. Under this legislation, a man does not need to have kerb-crawled previously. There is no necessity to prove persistence. The man need solicit only one prostitute and he will be prosecuted. The purpose of the legislation is to restore symmetry, but I believe that this measure shows an asymmetry in dealing with the sexes.

I have said that it will be difficult to get innocent women to give evidence. The police will be able to make their evidence stick only in an area prostitutes are known to frequent and only when dealing with a known prostitute. Unfortunately, that form of nuisance is not the form that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake seeks to redress. If a man wants a prostitute, the kerb crawling will occur quickly, at no inconvenience to other members of the public. The real inconvenience arises—I believe this offends every hon. Member—when a man accosts someone who is not a prostitute. The evidence will stick only in the case of a man who has got it right.

Miss Fookes: I suggest to my hon. Friend that one of the difficulties for residents is the accumulating number of cars that kerb-crawl. That in itself provides a nuisance, whether or not the transaction between a prostitute and a man occurs quickly. My hon. Friend has overlooked that point.

Mr. Parris: I have not overlooked that issue, but I believe that it is a less important nuisance than that caused by the enormous offence of importuning a woman who does not want to be importuned. A traffic nuisance is caused, but I hope that there are already sufficient traffic laws to deal with it.

The evidential burden for the prosecution which is imposed by clause 2 is greater than that imposed by clause 1. I believe that it would be safer for a man to solicit on the street than to solicit from a car. A man need solicit only once from a car and he can be caught. The effect of the legislation—I am sure this was not the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Drake, although it may unwittingly turn out this way—will be to drive men from their cars on to the street. It is not clear whether men accosting women on the street are a lesser public nuisance than men who solicit from their cars.

Mr. Mellor: The legislation covers the street.

Mr. Parris: The legislation certainly covers the street. On first reading of the Bill, my advice to any man wishing to solicit a prostitute is to get out of his car immediately. If he stays in his car, the police will face a lesser evidential burden. Clause 2(1) states:

> "A man commits an offence if in a street or public place he persistently solicits women (or the same woman) for the purpose of prostitution."

Other hon. Members have asked: what is persistence in this case? In the case of male importuning, which is not a happy precedent, persistence has usually been interpreted by the courts as soliciting twice or more frequently. In that case, we are not generally dealing with prostitutes. We are dealing with men trying to pick each other up, but not in return for money. For that reason, much more asking and refusing occurs.

The man who approaches a woman for the purpose of engaging her in prostitution probably approaches only one woman. As long as he has the money, the solicitation will probably cease. There may be a protracted period of haggling and negotiation, but it is a matter for lawyers and not for me whether, it having been decided that the woman will sell herself to the man, the subsequent negotiation about where and what price is a solicitation. I do not think it is. A man may spend some time in conversation with a woman and may cause quite a nuisance by doing so, but I would not call that persistent soliciting. If the Bill is enacted, this part of it will have to be explored by the courts. It is all rather uncertain.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend make a distinction which seems never to be made in the House? Homosexuality, whether between women or men, is a pathological distortion whereas heterosexuality is not.

Mr. Parris: For the first time so far, I do not agree with my hon. and learned Friend. He has raised an issue that forms part of another debate and I shall return to the Bill. I think that it will be safer for both of us if I do.

There is an evidential burden on the police or prosecution in a case where a man is said persistently to have solicited on the street. If the woman is a prostitute, I would think that there is no possibility of her giving evidence. If she is an innocent woman and not a prostitute, I suggest that her fear of being subjected to a certain form of cross-examination will cause her not to give evidence. I realise that many of my hon. Friends and Opposition Members hope that such a woman will be prepared to give evidence.

Let us consider the sort of cross-examination that an innocent woman is likely to be subjected to by counsel for the defence. It is likely pretty quickly to dissuade innocent women from making complaints and subjecting themselves to the ordeal by fire that they may well have to suffer if they choose to appear in court as witnesses. That leaves us again with the need to rely upon police evidence.

The police would have to be close before they could know that what was happening was a solicitation. There are many reasons for causing men to approach women in the street that are not solicitations. If a court is to believe on the evidence of the police officer alone that a solicitation has taken place, the officer will have to give quite detailed evidence. He or she will have to have heard what was said between the two parties. How will the officer be able to get sufficiently close to enable him or her to give that evidence, unless, again, we are talking about women police constables acting as decoys? I fear greatly that we are in danger of enacting legislation which can be enforced effectively by the police only if they act as decoys or agents provocateurs.

I have a good deal of sympathy for the police in this instance. The House dislikes the use of decoys and agents provocateurs. I dislike the practice intensely. However, if we introduce legislation that cannot be enforced in any other way, we shall be putting the police in a rather difficult position. The evidential burden will be a difficult one to sustain. There are genuine possibilities of mistake. Men may often ask women things in the street and if the encounters are observed from a distance they may appear to be solicitations, but in many instances they will not be. If a uniformed police officer observes a solicitation at a short distance from where it is taking place, the solicitation will stop. If a plain clothes officer observes a solicitation from a short distance, that will come pretty near to the officer acting as a decoy or agent provocateur.

Mr. Fairbairn: Let us say that a prostitute is stopped by a kerb crawler and he declines to pay the price that she demands. Why should she not go immediately to the police and, as an act of spite, tell them that the man is guilty of kerb crawling?

Mr. Parris: That may happen in theory, but there is an enormous natural reluctance on the part of prostitutes ever to go to the police about any issue. I may be wrong about that; it is something that I would not know very much about.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): By the definition of the hypothetical situation that has been posed, the man in question had kerb-crawled. I accept that the thrust of the Bill is not to prevent the association of prostitutes with clients but to protect the innocent from the unwanted attention of kerb crawlers. However, we are talking about the sort of person who is prepared potentially to solicit those in our society who are not prostitutes.

Mr. Parris: I should need to give more thought to what the hon. Gentleman has said before commenting upon it. He may be right.

Clause 3 states:

"A man commits an offence if he solicits a woman for sexual purposes in a manner likely to cause her fear."

The first question that arises in my mind concerns the area in which the clause applies. Will this provision apply anywhere? Will it apply to husband and wife? Will it apply at a discotheque, a party, a pub, a club or a bar? It is always wrong to solicit women in a manner which may cause them fear, but I can think of private circumstances in which it would not be appropriate for the criminal law to be introduced. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake does not envisage two people on a couch and at some stage one reaching for the telephone and calling the police.

I think that we shall be able to put things right in Committee. I rather doubt whether my hon. Friend means that the offence should extend beyond the streets and other public places, as well as the public transport network to which she has referred when dealing with other offences.

Clause 3 contains the phrase

"in a manner likely to cause her fear."

Why is that? The Criminal Law Revision Committee deals with this on page 14, section 47, of its report:

"We have formulated the offence as one of soliciting in a manner likely to cause fear because a man's liability to criminal sanctions should not depend upon any undue susceptibility to fear on the part of the woman solicited of which he was unaware."

I find that rather disingenuous. If it is desired to protect a man from the sort of woman who thinks that she has been solicited and is caused fear, although it was unreasonable for her to think so, it is possible to frame the offence in such a way as to make it clear that the man's behaviour had to be threatening, and, secondly, that the woman had to have been caused actual fear.

In those circumstances, the evidential burden would require the woman to be brought before the court to give evidence that fear had been caused. If the court decided that, though she had been caused fear, she was unreasonable to be afraid in the circumstances, the first of the two burdens would not have been satisfied. That is the burden that the man's behaviour had to be threatening. If it is said that his behaviour was not threatening, although the woman had been caused fear, he would be found not guilty.

I am afraid that the phrase

has been used so that we can rely upon police evidence. The police will be able to say that the way in which the man was acting was likely to cause the woman fear. If we are not obliged to call the woman as a witness to tell the court whether she was caused fear, police evidence alone, as the clause is drafted, will be sufficient. I am worried about the creation of an offence which can be proved entirely by police evidence.

How could we call the woman to give evidence of the offence? Would an innocent woman who had been caused fear by a sexual solicitation be willing to come before the courts to give evidence? In a few circumstances she might be prepared to do so, but in most she would not.

Let us imagine that Mrs. Carter complained to the police that a man had behaved in a threateningly sexually suggestive way before her and had caused her fear. Let us imagine also that the man is prosecuted and the man's defence counsel calls Mrs. Carter to give evidence. He may well ask her how she was dressed, whether she thought that she was dressed nicely on the evening in question, what she was doing on her own in a tube train carriage at that time of night, where she had been, where she was going, the name of her husband and whether her husband was away at the time.

It would be quite easy to make the woman look ridiculous and to suggest that she, by her behaviour, had in some way invited the solicitation. It would be easy for a skilled defence counsel to create that impression. I doubt very much whether the majority of women involved in such cases would be prepared to subject themselves to that form of cross-examination.

If the innocent woman will not come forward to give evidence and to subject herself to cross-examination, we will have to rely on police evidence. The easiest way of getting the necessary evidence will be to employ decoys. The details that will need to be given about the solicitation will be considerable.

If the court has to be persuaded that it was a solicitation and one likely to cause fear, that cannot easily be observed from 50 or 100 yards. It will be necessary to have heard the words spoken and seen the expressions on the faces of the people concerned. A policeman in uniform will never get that close and even a plain-clothes policeman is unlikely to be able to do so. Thus, the easiest and perhaps the only way to bring a charge will be through the use of police decoys. With great respect, it is all very well for the hon. Member for Tooting to say that he strongly opposes the use of decoys, but the legislation that he supports will be difficult to enforce in any other way. I, too, am acutely aware of that danger in the Bill as drafted.

Why do we need a special offence to deal with fear caused by sexual advances? The Minister has said that existing legislation on breaches of the peace is insufficient and he is undoubtedly right, but can we not re-examine the whole law on threatening behaviour and the causing of fear and reform it in such a way that anyone using threatening behaviour or causing fear by whatever means will be committing a criminal offence? One would then need simply to prove to the judge and jury that fear had been caused. For example, a black man on the underground may be caused fear if everyone else is white and those white people make racist remarks to him. Equally, a working miner may be caused fear if all the others present are strikers and they make remarks about scabs.

The essential element that makes the behaviour wrong is not the sexual motive but the fact that it causes fear. It has been made very clear, of course, that women on their own are susceptible to being caused fear by anything with a sexual content and that the merest hint may be sufficient to cause fear, but it is not beyond the wit of a court to take that into account and to understand that, although the suggestion was slight, its nature made it liable to cause fear. I do not see why there should be a special offence related to fear caused by sexual offences. We need a general offence relating to the causing of fear as such. If such an offence does not already exist, we should adapt the existing law to provide it.

I am not a lawyer, but I believe that these are to be summary offences and that defendants will not therefore be able to opt for trial by jury. I appreciate the reason why one does not want trial by jury in every case, but the reputation of a defendant may be very much at stake. With reference to male importuning, paragraph 3.38 of the Criminal Law Revision Committee report took the view that that offence should continue to carry the right to a trial by jury because > "some of our number believe that there should continue to be a right to a jury because of the serious consequences that may follow from a conviction for an offence of this character."

If that is true of those charged with homosexual offences, it is surely equally true of a married man accused of kerb crawling or putting a woman in fear, so there is a strong case for the right to a trial by jury.

In response to my earlier intervention, my hon. Friend the Member for Drake was reluctant to promise that the Bill could be changed to make it impossible for a prosecution to succeed on the basis of police evidence alone, although she suggested that she was sympathetic and that the matter could be examined in Committee. I believe that she was worried that such a provision would involve a legal novelty which for general reasons of precedent would be undesirable.

There are two ways in which such a provision could be written into the legislation. First, one could make a special rule of evidence attaching to this legislation to the effect that in any prosecution evidence must be given by the woman to whom offence or annoyance was caused. There is an objection to that on grounds of precedent, because it is not usual to frame offences with special rules of evidence attached to them. Moreover, a police officer has the common law right to give evidence about the extent to which he or she was solicited or embarrassed. Specifically to debar the police and to allow evidence only from members of the public in this respect would create a worrying precedent in the eyes of the Home Office lawyers.

A second and better way to achieve the same end would be to provide that annoyance—embarrassment, fear or whatever is decided—must actually be caused, rather than merely that the behaviour in question is liable to cause it. In all three cases—kerb crawling, soliciting on the pavement or putting a woman in fear—the annoyance or fear should be proved to have been caused as well as the behaviour being such as to cause it. Two tests then have to be satisfied. First, was the member of the public unduly susceptible or was the behaviour of the accused actually likely to produce fear? Secondly, was fear actually caused? If the legislation were framed in that way, I do not think that the offence could be proved without calling the innocent importunee as a witness. If that change were made, I think that the law would be entirely fair, but it might also be unworkable. For the reasons that I have given, I believe that it will be extremely difficult ever to persuade members of the public to give evidence.

I believe, therefore, that the Bill can be changed in such a way that it will not be offensive in terms of the burden of proof but I am worried that such a change might render the legislation less effective. At present, its effectiveness depends on giving undue weight to police evidence. I do not believe that we should create further legislation of that kind. We already have enough trouble with section 32 of the Sexual Offences Act in relation to male importuning and juries are increasingly reluctant to convict on the basis of police evidence in those cases. I believe that it would be a mistake to replicate those problems in new legislation of a similar type.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I warmly welcome the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes). As we have heard from Members in all parts of the House, kerb crawling causes not just aggravation but genuine fear, apprehension and anxiety to many people, especially women, in inner city areas such as my own. It is clear that the hon. Lady has addressed herself to a genuine and serious problem.

Since the passing of the Street Offences Act 1959, prostitution in Manchester has moved out into the suburb of Whalley Range, with the consequent imposition of the attentions of kerb crawlers on innocent people. The object of the Bill is not to control prostitution as such, but to deal with the problems associated with kerb crawling. For that reason I warmly welcome the hon. Lady's initiative, although, like other hon. Members, I wish to express certain reservations.

I have some sympathy for the earlier remarks of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris). He spoke of the need for a more general view of prostitution in society, bearing in mind the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. So far the remarks of the Minister have been somewhat disappointing, and I look forward to his concluding speech.

Society accepts that prostitution itself is not illegal, but we also accept that prostitution and associated matters can cause problems. It is the problems associated with prostitution that we wish to regulate, in the interests of members of the community not directly involved in prostitution. Within that context, as I think the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West would agree, I am sure that we can go a considerable way towards alleviating the problem of kerb crawling.

I should have welcomed a stronger line on Government policy from the Minister. The issue is difficult and controversial, but that is no reason for failing to take action. We will never achieve a consensus on difficult problems, which clearly divide people on emotive as well as intellectual grounds.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) may not agree with all that I say. However, I agree with his view that even if we reform both the legal structure and our social attitudes towards prostitution—allowing, for example, some form of advertising, or allowing locations to be established which prostitutes could use without automatically breaking the law—there would still be the problem of prostitutes being driven on to the streets for economic reasons, and therefore the problem of kerb crawling would remain.

The comments of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West were somewhat absolutist. I have considerable sympathy for his call for a broad revision of the law, but to prove that kerb crawling in isolation is a difficult problem is not enough. I agreed with the hon. Gentleman's comments about the difficulty of maintaining a balance between the rights of the accused and the rights of those upon whom the unwanted attentions of the kerb crawlers are forced.

I find nothing especially objectionable in the criminalisation of the kerb crawler. Criminalisation per se is simply a recognition of the lack of symmetry in the current law. Soliciting is a criminal offence, but seeking out prostitutes is not. The two acts should perhaps be brought into line. Being found guilty of kerb crawling—being branded as a kerb crawler — would have tremendous implications for the person concerned. Clearly, therefore, the test that we establish must be acceptable and sufficient, given the strength of the public opprobium that would fall upon anyone found guilty of such an offence.

I share the views of those hon. Members who have suggested that the idea of victimless crime is not satisfactory. We should stipulate that those affected must be able and willing to substantiate the charge. I accept that that would cause real problems. Such a stipulation would mean that in many cases it would be impossible to sustain a charge, without trying to bend the rules of evidence, against someone who was guilty of the crime. That is the price that we would have to pay for protecting the innocent; for protecting those who might, for instance, be subject to blackmail.

I recognise the difficulties outlined by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West. However, the problems connected with kerb crawling would be akin to some extent to those involved in trials for rape. The pressures put upon the main witness would be similar to those suffered by the main witness in a rape case. There would be the same unhappy and perhaps even malicious attempts to blacken the character of the witness. That is a problem that I do not take lightly. It is at no small cost that we insist that a woman should stand up in the witness box and talk about being solicited by a kerb crawler. However, we accept the necessity for that in the case of rape because rape is, by any stretch of the imagination, a very serious charge. To be found guilty of kerb crawling would also be a serious matter, and we must therefore accept that the test of evidence should be sufficiently strong and that the complainant should have to appear in court.

There is some strength of feeling on that issue even among those who warmly applaud the intentions of the hon. Member for Drake. I applaud the Bill on behalf of my constituents, and especially the women in the area of my constituency where the problem is at its worst. For too long people have felt that Parliament was not prepared to grasp the nettle. In bringing the Bill forward the hon. Lady is addressing a real problem. With the reservations that I have expressed, I wish the Bill all speed.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate. When I was the leader of Wandsworth borough council, I was very familiar with the problems at Bedford hill, so vividly described by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox). However, the problems in Southampton are probably even more acute. I am therefore delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) has been successful in the ballot. I thank her for the good turn that she has done my constituents by choosing this subject for her Bill.

It is also fair to thank my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for his success in persuading the Criminal Law Revision Committee to publish its report on prostitution on the streets sooner than was originally intended.

Having heard the eloquent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), I hope that he will think it worth his while to come to see the problem on the ground in Southampton. A real problem exists, and we, as legislators, must try to solve it.

Mr. Parris: I live no more than three quarters of a mile from the area in Wandsworth which the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) mentioned. I shall not give the name of the street, as I do not want to give it any extra publicity. I fully understand the problems and do not underestimate them.

Mr. Chope: I am interested to learn that my hon. Friend has knowledge of these matters. I am therefore all the more disappointed that his speech was so negative. I had hoped that there would be unanimity on the intentions behind the Bill.

I regret that we are embarking on piecemeal legislation. Kerb crawling is a serious problem in Southampton and causes public nuisance. The same is true of the practice of using good residential accommodation as a prostitute's shop. In the windows of such houses are illuminated red signs which are offensive to passers-by and lower the tone of an otherwise pleasant neighbourhood. In one part of my constituency there are about 30 houses which are used solely for prostitution. Hanging outside them are signs saying, "Model", "Nude Model" and "Young Model". I have yet to see a sign that says, "Used Model", but no doubt that time will come. It is a pity that the Bill does not meet the mischief that I have described.

An owner-occupier can find that the house next door is sold and turned into a prostitute's shop. If it were turned into a greengrocer's shop, or a take-away shop, he could get help from the local planning authority, but Southampton city council takes the view that a change of use to a prostitute's shop is not covered by planning legislation, so enforcement proceedings are not possible.

I understand that the Bill cannot go too wide in order to ensure that it reaches the statute book with the least possible difficulty, but I envisage an increasing number of houses being bought and converted into prostitutes' shops after it has been enacted. Such properties are not brothels, because the courts have held that two or more women must practice prostitution in one premise for it to be a brothel. It is not an offence for a landlord to let premises to a prostitute.

To describe the extent of the problem, I should like to quote from a letter. Unfortunately, it was sent anonymously, but it sets the problem out clearly. It reads:

"My son bought a house and spent a great deal of money on it, only to have a prostitute move in next door to him. The man who bought the house obviously bought it for prostitution. Men called there during the day and night with CB aerials on their cars. Constant noisy knocking on the door, noisy car doors banging, wild noisy parties going on until 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning, video shows to youths, but worst of all her pimps and gangsters were the biggest nuisance. After my son complained he was constantly followed by these men. CBs are a nuisance with these men and girls. My son was threatened and had unpleasant things done about their home. My poor grandchildren wondered what it was all about. The people moved out the other side. I have begged my son to move for his wife and children's sake. How can he cope with six pimps?"

The writer then appeals to me as her local Member of Parliament to try to change the law.

An excellent housing association operates in the part of Southampton to which I have referred and in which there is much urban renewal, but the association receives letters from tenants such as this:

"My reason for wanting to move out of my present accommodation. I have had men ringing my door bell in the early hours of the morning."

That is another problem that is not addressed by the Bill.

A resident complained to me of being threatened because he parks his car outside a house where one of the model signs hangs. He has been threatened because his car obscures the advertisement from passers-by and therefore interferes with business. He would desperately like to sell his house, but its value has declined because of the activities that I have described.

Mr. Fairbairn: In any of these cases, have the people complained to the police and have prosecutions been brought, because it is perfectly obvious that common law criminal offences were committed?

Mr. Chope: Almost invariably complaints are made to the police, but I am told by the police that it is difficult to produce enough evidence to secure conviction. The police in Southampton say that one of their biggest disappointments is that, even when they successfully prosecute the people who are behind the vice business, the fines are derisory and the sentences of imprisonment, if there are any, are for only a few months. Such sentences do not reflect the gravity of the offences.

That brings me to the issue of the deterrent effect of prison sentences for soliciting. I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Drake and other hon. Members who have said that they welcomed the decision to remove imprisonment as a penalty for those who solicit as prostitutes. The Criminal Law Revision Committee report provides telling evidence on page 6. It states that in 1983 there were about 10,000 convictions for loitering and soliciting. The committee expects the figure to be even higher for 1984. I do not know whether it was, possibly because of the impact of the miners' strike. Before the penalty of imprisonment was removed, the figure for the years 1975 to 1981 was always between 3,000 and 4,200. Therefore, there have been at least twice as many convictions for loitering or soliciting since the penalty of imprisonment was removed.

The figures for Southampton reflect the national picture. In 1984 there were 143 charges for soliciting and 74 cautions. In 1978 there were only 17 charges and 29 cautions. In 1982, the last year before the penalty of imprisonment was removed, there were 39 charges and 54 cautions.

Mr. Parris: Is my hon. Friend aware that there was a similar increase in prosecutions for male importuning, but that the imprisonment penalty remains available to the courts?

Mr. Chope: I cannot comment on that point, but I hear and note what my hon. Friend says.

My submission is that the removal of the penalty of imprisonment for soliciting by prostitutes has resulted in an increase in the practice. That is supported in a letter that I received from the chief constable of Hampshire, dated 16 December 1983. He said:

"We shall continue to police the area closely with a view to the reduction of prostitution there. It has to be recognised, however, that substantial relief for those who are offended and inconvenienced must await the revision of section 71 of the 1982 Criminal Justice Act."

I hope, therefore, that the Government will reconsider the wisdom of removing the penalty of imprisonment.

Southampton county council has written to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary about that and asked for the reinstatement of the sanction of imprisonment. There is overwhelming evidence that that would help to solve the problem to a great extent. Even if the Home Secretary is not prepared to reintroduce that penalty, I hope that he will use the opportunity presented by today's debate to advise magistrates that average fines, which are between £25 and £100, are derisory for the offence of soliciting. Even penalties imposed for living off immoral earnings seem low. Substantial imprisonment should be the norm when the vice barons are eventually brought before the courts.

The local newspaper, the Southern Evening Echo, this week produced an informative and excellent piece of journalism. From talking to prostitutes it found that, on average, each prostitute working during the day could have seven clients, at £10 a time. That is £70 a day, leaving aside income that can be earned in the evenings and at night. Obviously, when prostitutes are prosecuted, a fine of £50 or so is little more than a licence fee. I hope, therefore, that the Government will have second thoughts about penalties.

I have little doubt that the Bill when passed into law will ameliorate the problem of street prostitution, but I do not believe that it will solve it. The wise punter, as he is called, will abandon his car, go on foot, and wait to be solicited rather than do the soliciting. It is clear from clause 2 that it will be necessary to prove that someone has persistently solicited on foot before he can be brought before the courts. For the person who leaves his car in another area, walks for five or 10 minutes and sees the call girls standing on the corners, one transaction will not result in his being brought before the courts. The police find it almost impossible to prosecute most call girls because, to use their words, they can be recognised at a distance of 100 yards and do not get anywhere near seeing what happens when the offence is committed. Paragraph 44 of the report by the Criminal Law Revision Committee states that it would not be appropriate to convict men for only one act of soliciting on the footway.

As a result of the pressure that will be created by the Bill, more prostitutes will be forced into taking accommodation and erecting advertising signs outside. I have little doubt that the Bill will deter kerb crawlers in cars, but I am a little worried about having sufficient safeguards for the innocent. None of us should forget, in the emotion of the moment, the need to protect the innocent from mistaken charges. In this area, wrongful conviction is not the mischief; the mere charging, being brought before the courts, and having one's name and address published in the local newspaper could ruin many a career or marriage. Much public humiliation can be caused just by a charge being made. We must be sure that the legislation contains adequate safeguards for the innocent.

I am thinking especially of the calculating prostitute who summons a passing motorist, who is then arrested by a policeman. The prostitute will not stay to say, "I will give evidence on your behalf," and the policeman will not know whether the transaction was initiated by the motorist or by the prostitute. That could lead to innocent people being brought before the courts.

The police support the view that prostitutes are calculating and cunning people. Inspector Openshawe of Southampton said recently:

"The men cruise around looking for the model signs, but are bread and butter for the girls who stand on the street corners."

What happens is that those who are not lucky enough to have a residential base from which to operate their business try to intercept passing motorists who are looking for the model signs. That officer believes that stopping kerb crawling will put part-time prostitutes out of business, but will not solve the basic problem.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee believes, in relation to clause 1, that it should be necessary for the victim—the woman who is solicited by the man—to give evidence in court. I can see the practical reasons for that. Any legislation in this area must balance the public nuisance against the need to ensure that charges are brought clearly.

Anything would be better than the situation that has existed recently in Nottingham, where policewomen have been posing as prostitutes and trapping men, who have later appeared before the courts for alleged breaches of the peace. That type of entrapment is unsatisfactory and I hope that it will not be considered a necessary ingredient in the enforcement of this Bill.

Points of criticism about the Bill are best made in Committee and I shall not voice them now. I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West about clause 1(1)(b) and I, too, wonder whether it will improve matters. Its drafting leaves much to be desired. I am reminded of a pop song entitled, "Get off of my cloud". The provision could, perhaps, be better expressed.

Clause 3, by being drawn so widely as to include soliciting in a public and private place, is going unnecessarily far. The Bill is designed to deal with a public nuisance. It would be unfortunate to extend the law as it relates to indecent assault in the way suggested, and the implications of the clause do not appear to have been fully considered.

"in a manner likely to cause her fear"

Mr. Fairbairn: If my hon. Friend asked a girl, "Will you sleep with me?", does he think that those words would be covered by that provision?

Mr. Chope: I look forward to my hon. and learned Friend asking that question when he speaks in the debate.

The Southern Evening Echo this week concluded that the saddest irony about trying to improve the position of the area in Southampton with which I am concerned is that virtually all its problems have been increased by well-intentioned efforts to solve them.

I support the Bill, because it is well intentioned, and in the earnest hope that it will help to reduce the public nuisance with which it is intended to deal. However, I urge the Government not to be slow to introduce their own legislation to deal with the problem of advertising and the use of residential accommodation by prostitutes if the expected result of this legislation is that the girls simply go off the streets and place advertisements in otherwise pleasant neighbourhoods.

I hope that the Bill will receive support from hon. Members on both sides, because its shortcomings, which are few, can be remedied in Committee.

12.48 pm

Mr. Ernie Roberts (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I, too, compliment the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on having introduced the Bill as a result of her name being selected in the ballot. I had my name drawn in the ballot and was immediately solicited by Wandsworth borough council to introduce a Bill on kerb crawling and prostitution. The council wrote me a lengthy letter in which it said:

"The police do what they can to try and reduce the nuisance and . . . they have each month for some considerable time been prosecuting up to 60 to 70 women for soliciting for prostitution. It is generally accepted, however, that as a long-term solution this action is not the answer and that to really have any measure of success the drivers of the cars who are looking for prostitutes must be dissuaded from doing so."

The House already knows this, but I wish to draw attention to the fact that people selling their bodies is not the only kind of prostitution with which society is plagued. People sell both their brains and their principles, often for immoral purposes, and sometimes that can do more harm to society than prostitution does.

The Bill tries to deal with the problem of kerb crawling and prostitution, a problem that is prevalent in my constituency. I have had many meetings with residents for over a number of years about the problems in the Brownswood, Finsbury park and Manor house areas. We have taken action to try to prevent the problem, but that action has caused a great nuisance. We have put gates across the roads to stop kerb crawling. We do it to one road, which stops the kerb crawling there, but then there is a demand from the next road, and so it goes on. We continually push the kerb crawling out, but we do not get rid of it. Therefore, the problem has not been reduced.

Mothers and young women have complained to me about the insulting attitudes of motorists driving along soliciting them in the areas that I have mentioned. Every day, and particularly at night, these women go about with the ever-present fear of attack. I know that the chief of police for Stoke Newington and a colleague of his are here listening to the debate because of the seriousness of the problem in that part of London.

Recently, there has been a heavy police presence in the areas that I have mentioned, resulting in many more prosecutions, but the problem still exists. Only last night, a deputation of young women came to see me and urged me to speak out on the problem of kerb crawling and soliciting by motorists. I am in favour of some legislation to deal with the problem, but I know that many of the women who are involved in prostitution are driven on to the streets to get money because of unemployment and poverty. When unemployment increases, as it has done, prostitution increases. It is no coincidence that we are discussing this problem at a time of mass unemployment. I ask the Government to look at this aspect of the problem and take steps to alleviate unemployment, which drives women on to the streets to get a living.

Some dangers are inherent in the Bill. I have certain doubts about the Bill, and the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) has already set out some of those doubts, although I do not agree with all that he said when he was endeavouring to pick holes in the Bill. I do not want the innocent to suffer as a result of the Bill becoming law, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Drake does not either.

The Prevention of Terrorism Act also affects my constituency. Altogether, in various parts of Britain and Ireland 6,000 people have been picked up under the provisions of that Act. Only 2·5 per cent. of the cases resulted in prosecution. That means that almost 98 per cent. of the people who were picked were not charged. We must not rest on police evidence alone. There must be a victim and corroborative evidence to sustain a conviction.

The Stoke Newington police and Labour Members representing the London area will understand why I do not want the Bill to result in another sus operation. Sufficient aggravation has already been caused in Hackney by people being picked up under the sus law. However, action must be taken to stop kerb crawling which causes so much aggravation and fear among women in my constituency.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): As a Scotsman whose constituents will not be affected by the Bill, I advance with caution and modesty into the chilly waters of the law of England, but with more bravery and courage having heard some of the abominable contradictions in the law of natural justice which I could not believe were characteristics of the law of England until they were confirmed by so honourable a source as the Minister himself.

My remarks about the Bill will perhaps be strident, but I pay tribute to the motive of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), to her crusade and to the civilised way in which she has always treated matters criminal.

I find it extraordinary that the common law of England is such that the charge of breach of the peace at common law is not punishable by sentence other than some adulatory absurdity like, "Be good for all time coming."

I am a lawyer. The difference between the law of Scotland and that of England is that we act on principle and the law of England acts on precedent — a bad precedent and a worse principle. As a lawyer I have always taken the view that the grandeur of the common law and particularly of the criminal common law is that it is adaptable to any occasion or incidence and any rise or fall of an irritance which gives threat to the safety of the public.

A good example of that is the fact that in Scotland we have no difficulty in adapting the common law of assault to the current evil of glue sniffing, whereas in England it has to be made a statutory offence. I foresee that that will give great joy to those instructed for the defence and have little effect on those instructed for the prosecution. I do not wish to be too pessimistic about that. Any criminal offence which we attempt to enshrine in statute is infinitely more likely to be defeated in its operation than any common law offence.

I speak not only from ignorance of the law of England but from compulsory ignorance of the law of England. Although a Frenchman, a Dutchman, a Belgian, a Greek and shortly a Spaniard and a Portuguese who do not speak a word of English can appear in the courts of England, I cannot. As a Scotsman I am forbidden and banished from the audience of England's courts. It is an astonishing proposition. Nevertheless, it is true. Therefore, my compulsory ignorance of the law of England has today received a number of shocks which I am sure would have shocked the civilised mind of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), a former Home Secretary, who has joined us.

I did not know that it was not possible under the law of England to punish the offence of breach of the peace. Under the law of Scotland, a breach of the peace can go from the most trivial to the most serious matter, although it would probably be charged as something more serious, and under the common law the sentence could be anything from nothing to life imprisonment. Similarly, the matters we are considering today could be charged as assault or malicious mischief. If one goes up to a woman and pesters her, and it is held that one did, and if the concept of criminal intention, which we call mens rea, is established, one would be guilty of the offence, under the law of Scotland, of a breach of the peace, or of malicious mischief or of assault. For instance, if one went up to a woman in the street and said, "By the way, ducksie, do you ever wash?" that would be a criminal offence under the common law—far less than, "By the ducksie, will you sleep with me?"

I find it astonishing that the common law of England cannot deal with this form of assault—because it is an assault. One does not have to hit somebody, or make to hit somebody. Just to put one's tongue out at somebody is an assault under the law. If it is not an assault under the law of England, perhaps the Minister, who is qualified to do so, will tell me. I should have thought that any assault — kerb crawling or asking somebody who is not a prostitute to sleep with you is certainly an assault—was covered by the ordinary law of England and accordingly could be punished by the law of England. My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), in a most cogent, intelligent and well-argued speech that was remarkable for somebody who protested that he was not a lawyer, correctly pointed out the difficulties of every section of this complicated statute which attempts to smother the irritation, however major it may be in some places, of kerb crawling. It seems to me to be a very dangerous precedent. Fortunately, we do not have kerb crawling in Perthshire. Frequently we do not even have kerbs, far less kerb crawlers.

The point which my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West attempted to make, although he drew back, frank though he was, from the absolute truthfulness of saying so, is that in this country we are schizophrenic about prostitution. I have never been there, but I assume there is no kerb crawling in Bangkok. There is certainly no kerb crawling in Amsterdam, or even canal crawling. That is because they are not dishonest about prostitution. We in this country half pretend that it is wrong and half pretend that it is acceptable. For fear of the women's righteousness, of society, or of something of that kind, no Government dare to say, "If it is going to exist, and it will exist, let us try to civilise it."

The Minister gave abstruse and lengthy reasons about how long it would take to read the report. I presume that the Government cannot read a report which took me less than an hour. Why will it take the Government months or years to read it? The reason is not that, but that we fear the moral backlash, if there is to be prostitution, of trying to make it something which is not a nuisance to others. That is the nub of the truth. I notice that my hon. Friend the Minister has risen neither to confirm nor to deny it, so I take it that he has confirmed it by his silence.

Mr. Mellor: That is not a very good legal principle.

Mr. Fairbairn: It is not a very good legal principle, but——

Mr. Mellor: I was trying to behave myself in the interest of keeping Mr. Deputy Speaker happy. It is not a very good legal principle, and not one that the law of Scotland embraces, that silence implies any condition. But the moment is shortly to arrive when, if I am fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the debate and I shall deal with that point then.

Mr. Fairbairn: I know that my hon. Friend finds it difficult to behave and I am glad that he is trying to do so for a change. I am glad that your authority, Mr. Deputy Speaker, has invoked that departure from his natural deliquency. While it may not be a good legal principle, it is perfectly obvious to me as a lawyer that that is the correct inference from his silence, and not that he was terrified that the headmaster would scold him again.

There is a legal principle of the presumption of innocence but in one way it is an extraordinary principle. Indeed, the right to silence is as odd. One says, "I presume that you are innocent and therefore I am charging you with the murder of your mother. I shall stick you in the dock with armed policemen" — truncheoned policemen in Scotland—"on either side of you to demonstrate that I presume that you did not do it". The presumption of innocence, which is a fiction of the law, is meant to apply to the jury only, not to anyone else. That is why the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Mr. Roberts) was right to say that a charge gives rise in the public mind to a presumption of guilt, regardless of the eventual verdict.

Equally, the right to silence, which is what the Minister raised, is an oddity. The reason for the right to silence, in England as well as in Scotland, is, to put it briefly, that until the 1890s the accused was not allowed to give evidence. Therefore, he was advised that, since anything that he said could not be corrected, denied, altered or explained, he would be sensible to say nothing lest it be misunderstood.

The classic example is of F. E. Smith, defending a woman who had been charged with infanticide, who was said by a witness to have said to the police, "How can I kill my baby?" That was important evidence for the prosecution until F. E. Smith said, "Are you sure that she did not say, 'How can I kill my baby?'?" Those were the same words with a different interpretation; indeed, the opposite.

The reason for the right of silence was forgotten about after the statutes in Scotland and England in 1889 and 1891. It is an oddity of the law and a madness that a person is told, "We believe that you are the person who murdered Mrs. Snooks. We believe that you are the one person who is able to tell us everything about it and you are the one person who we say need not tell us anything about it." The right of silence is not a protection when the accused is allowed to give evidence, but was a necessary protection before he was permitted to do so.

Therefore, I do not accept the concept from a lawyer that silence is indicative of guilt. Indeed, the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act, which I had the honour of introducing into Scotland in 1980, provides that if a person does not put forward a defence at the time of his initial examination which he puts forward thereafter, there can be an inference that the defence is flawed. In other words, silence does have an inference. I should have thought that that was a sensible provision of the law.

Being limited in intention, the Bill would be infinitely more likely to aggravate the general problem which concerns my hon. Friend the Member for Drake. I shall not repeat the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Fairbairn]

Derbyshire, West, except to say that I believe it is extremely unlikely that one could persuade an innocent woman to come forward to say that she had been mistaken for a prostitute. It would also be extremely unlikely for a prostitute to come forward saying that she had been rightly thought to be a prostitute.

This brings me back to the concept that I did not know existed in the laws of any civilised land. In Scotland, there is a rule of evidence which states that hearsay evidence is inadmissible. Many of us mishear, misinterpret, misrecollect or misunderstand what another person said or what that person had in mind when he said it. Tests have been conducted, including on television, to examine this aspect. One could ask a Minister on one end of the Front Bench to pass the message, "The parcel will be here by Christmas." By the time the message reaches the Minister at the other end of the Front Bench the message is probably, "I wonder if you want turkeys to listen to." People misinterpret and alter evidence, although not deliberately. That is why their evidence is disallowed.

I am bound to say, as a lawyer and jurisprudent, that I am horrified that in England two policemen can tell the court what someone would have said if he had been called to give evidence. I trust that that provision will be removed from the law of England. I hope it is not proposed to convict a kerb crawler on the basis of a policeman's evidence that a woman told him that the man was kerb crawling. The policeman does not even need to meet that woman. The policeman can simply say, "Mrs. White came up to me and told me that so-and-so kerb-crawled." That seems to be a good way for a policeman to get rid of a public nuisance. He may say, "I shall tell you what we shall do. We shall do him for kerb crawling on our say-so."

If that is the law of England, I trust that the Government, in their new legislation to introduce the independent prosecution system which we enjoy in Scotland, will include a clause to remove that offensive provision. That evidence is not even hearsay; it is soothsay. It is mystery evidence. I was horrified to learn that the Bill will enable a person to be convicted of an offence and cause the greatest possible harm on the say-so of witnesses who are not "witnesses" in the proper sense of the word.

The meticulousness of the language is another issue that concerns me. According to clause 3, it is an offence for a man to solicit a woman for the purpose of prostitution. It is not, however, an offence for a woman to solicit a man. It is an offence if a man solicits from a motor vehicle in a street or public place. Complicated though that is, it is possibly comprehensible. Clause 1(1)(b) refers to a man soliciting

"while in the immediate vicinity of a motor vehicle that he has just got out of or off."

I do not know of many people who get off motor vehicles, but I suppose that one gets off a bus. So that is fair enough: if I get out of my motor vehicle and go up to speak to a prostitute I commit a criminal offence.

That is extraordinary. I have no particular desire to get out of my motor car to speak to a prostitute because that is not a habit or recreation that is particularly attractive to me. Oddly enough, if a man goes up to a girl whom he believes is anxious for someone to sleep with her and asks whether she is willing to sleep with him, he is committing a criminal offence if he has just got out of a motor car. However, it is not a criminal offence if the individual has not got out of his motor car. It is all right if he has just dropped in by parachute, come out of a drain or walked out of his house. That is all right, but he will be branded a naughty boy if he has just got out of his motor car. My goodness me, that is a naughty thing to do! That is the absurdity of the Bill. I wish to make it clear to my hon. Friend the Member for Drake that I am mocking statute law as a whole and not her. It is almost impossible to make criminal offences, especially trivial ones of the sort with which we are dealing, sensible in statute.

Clause 3 leads me to thank god that I am not English. The clause makes it an offence if a man solicits a woman for sexual purposes

"in a manner likely to cause her fear."

I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Drake that I have always been attracted to her. I have never actually dared ask her whether she would go to to bed with me, but after the introduction of the Bill I must ask myself how I am to put it so that it does not cause her fear.

When I was the Solicitor-General for Scotland in the palace of Holyrood house, I was in charge of events, as historically the Solicitor-General for Scotland is, and in attendance on the Prime Minister who was a guest of the Lord High Commissioner of the Church of Scotland, who stands in for the Queen. The Solicitor-General for Scotland has to be there in his shadow because a previous Lord High Commissioner tried to close down the Church of Scotland. I can see good reason to close down the Church of England, but that is another matter.

A gentleman who for reasons of chivalry I shall not mention but who occupied grand office and who had taken grandly of wine and allowed veritas to overcome him went up to the Prime Minister and in words which I shall not use told her that he had always fancied her, to which the Prime Minister replied, "Quite right. You have very good taste, but I just don't think you would make it at the moment." Would that have been an offence under clause 3? The answer is that it would. Therefore, I regard clause 3 as obnoxious in any possible character. It makes every advance of a man towards a woman a potential criminal offence. For example, let us suppose that a man marries a girl and on the night of their honeymoon says, "What about going up to the bedroom?" If she shrinks back and asks, "What do you mean?", the result would be an offence under clause 3.

Similarly, to make it an offence under clause 2 persistently to solicit a woman or women has the ring of schizophrenia. Apparently, we are allowed to have prostitutes, but we are not allowed to ask them if they would be willing to act as prostitutes. Therefore, I find clause 2 to embody a most extraordinary concept.

I hope that I shall not pass through the thin legal skin on evidential matters of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department in referring to his silence. Am I right to understand that a crime of sodomy or buggery committed with a woman or a girl is not an offence known to the law of England? If it is an offence known to the law of England, why cannot it be charged as such? Why must it be dealt with as a charge of indecent assault? In Scotland, there is a range of common law sexual offences including indecent assault, lewd and libidinous practices, attempted rape and many others. I do not believe that it can be proved that if a man were to have anal intercourse with a girl of 13 he would not be charged with serious assault and sodomy. If that is the law in England, the Bill does nothing to relieve it. If it is not, I find it impossible to conceive what the law of England is.

I strongly oppose fixed penalties, except perhaps for parking offences and the like, or terminal penalties. If the Poisons Act, say, provides a maximum penalty of 14 years imprisonment, is the judge to conclude that if the case involves half a poison the offence merits seven years? It is a bad principle and in my experience has no effect on offenders. When the judge says, "I therefore sentence you to . . .", hesitates, coughs and finally comes out with the number of years, the defendant may get a shock, but that is the end of the matter.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Drake believes that people who commit minor sexual offences will be deterred by terrible penalties, I remind her of the Straffen case in England. Instead of being hanged for raping little children, the defendant was found insane and sent to Broadmoor. He then escaped and thereafter was declared sane on the basis that within 20 minutes of getting out he raped the first little child that he found. There was not much deterrent effect on him and I doubt whether there would be on anyone else.

I object strongly to the idea that so-called attempted rape should suddenly become liable to a sentence of life imprisonment. In Scotland, a sentence of up to life imprisonment is possible for any common law offence. If that is what the English want, they have only to reform their law in that way. A case has come into my hands just this week. I shall not go into details as it is sub judice and I have yet to defend the unfortunate gentleman concerned. It concerns a prostitute who had slept regularly over the years with a citizen whose respectability would allow him to sit in the civil servants box or even in your Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That man, without a smut on his reputation, has been charged with attempted rape by a woman with whom he has slept on and off for years. I believe that all criminal offences should be judged and sentenced on the facts and not on the basis of imaginary concepts framed in statute.

For all those reasons, although I applaud the purpose of my hon. Friend the Member for Drake, I believe that the method that she has chosen is so deficient as to be not just inequitable but positively bad.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): One of the challenges facing Members who wish to speak on subjects of this nature is that when one arrives one has a clear idea of what one wishes to say, but after more than three hours of debate one's views may have changed. Hon. Members on both sides have expressed their views on the Bill and I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) on introducing it. English and Welsh Members have had the benefit of the views of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) on Scottish law, although one cannot but wonder how a Scottish debating Chamber would receive an Englishman or a Welshman telling it how things are done in England and Wales. However, at least we can exchange ideas.

Mr. Fairbairn: I take my precedent from the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), who never stops telling us what should happen outside Ireland.

Mr. King: Prostitution has been called the oldest profession in the world. In a college debate in which I took part many years ago, somebody suggested that salesmanship deserved that title, and someone else suggested marketing, because the prostitute, as well as selling herself, has to define her client and the place where she intends to carry on her trade. However, prostitution is certainly among the oldest professions. It is a cause for serious concern in many inner cities, especially in London and Southampton. In Southampton, a ferry port, the phenomenon is perhaps best described, not as kerb crawling but as roll-on—roll-off.

In Birmingham, kerb crawling has reached epidemic proportions and we cannot wait much longer for legislation to control it. I have here a letter from the St. Paul's Community Project in Balsall Heath, which is one of the worst afflicted areas. The letter was sent to Wandsworth borough council in reply to the council's request for details of prostitution and kerb crawling in Birmingham. According to the letter, is now very much greater than it has been.

> "The number of kerb-crawlers in the area"

> "Our calculations suggest that some 900 per day circulate our area."

Every day, some 900 cars circulate in an area half a mile square, driven by gentlemen looking for prostitutes. The letter continues:

> "Kerb-crawlers accost residents, young and old, as they seem to feel that any female in the area is connected to the industry. The industry has become so visible and blatant that residents are now moving out and it is difficult to attract newcomers. The economy as well as the confidence of the area has become affected. In the last 5 years the City, with Government help, has spent over £20 million in an attempt to re-vitalise our inner area of Birmingham. Most now concede that this money has been wasted because the 'red-light' public image of our area has countered its effect. So long as the image remains, residents feel, the area cannot be rejuvenated."

There is a very real concern.

Birmingham is seeking to become the convention capital of Europe. The projected convention centre, built on inner city slum clearance land, plans to employ some 2,000 or 3,000 people and to offer conference facilities to 10,000 delegates at a time. Convention centres usually attract the social problems that we do not happen to like. In Las Vegas, for instance, prostitution takes a very different form from that which it takes in our cities. I believe that the prostitutes, or hookers, are licensed.

The fact that we are trying to outlaw certain actions by citizens who seek the comforts offered by prostitutes should not cloud the fact that there is still a need within society for such a service. If Birmingham is to become a convention centre—as I hope it will—certain social obligations will arise, and we may well need to reconsider our attitude to the whole question of prostitution. Should it be legalised? Should we—as has been suggested—set up brothels run by the city or by the council? There is no point in simply shifting the problem so that a different aspect of it comes to the fore. The prostitute is a versatile woman. History shows that as one door is shut she will find another one that will open, because the demand remains. That demand will remain, whatever law is introduced.

The Bill refers to men only because it is considered that men are the prime culprits of kerb crawling. We understand kerb crawling to be driving down roads slowly while looking for ladies to solicit. I have some experience of kerb crawling in America, because I went for a night-time walk with my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd) to look at the red-light district of Washington. There, kerb crawlers do not kerb crawl, but pull up at a halt sign, where the girls congregate. They have to stop to negotiate the crossroads. I wonder whether that will be legitimate after the Bill has been enacted.

It might be possible that if we take men out of cars we shall put women back in them. There might be a reversal of roles, with men walking the streets and women soliciting from cars. Prostitutes are resourceful and will do all that they can to maintain their rather dubious standard of living. The car is the vital ingredient, as it affords the opportunity of sexual liaison without the need for entering a hotel or flat. The interiors of cars are now much bigger than they used to be and they tend to have reclining seats. It does not take much imagination to understand why they are so useful in this trade.

I also wonder about the Bill's definition of a motor car. We understand the car to be a four-wheeled vehicle, but a new beast has recently been introduced—Sir Clive Sinclair's C5 runabout. It is not a motor car, but it can kerb crawl. Indeed, that is about all that it can do. Is it possible that someone in a Sinclair battery car will not be covered by the Bill and will therefore be able to solicit from the doubtful comfort of his motorised bath-chair? Although many clients wish to remain anonymous, I understand that it is possible to buy necessary accessories to make oneself just that in a little Sinclair car.

The Bill deals with prostitution and soliciting in a car and in the street, but why does it not simply say that it is illegal for men to solicit for prostitutes in a street? It matters little whether they are on foot or in a car. We must also qualify what is meant by "persistent soliciting". It is an offence to solicit once from a car, but presumably it is permissible to solicit more than once when on foot. It is difficult to define who is doing the soliciting. It is often the prostitute who will ask, "Would you like to do a little bit of business?" That could be defined in several ways.

Clause 3 deals with soliciting causing fear. Fear must depend upon the emotional experience of the woman concerned. Ladies respond differently to actions by men. A man might make a physical action and scare one woman witless, while another woman might just smile. There are also enormous problems associated with sorting out how and where an offence was committed.

I welcome the Bill because it goes a long way towards dealing with the horrible problems that are experienced daily in Birmingham. I am sure that the citizens of Birmingham welcome anything that outlaws this odious activity. Nevertheless, the Bill must be examined carefully so that some of the dangers inherent in it are reduced to a minimum.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I am glad that I was able to listen to the whole debate before making my contribution from the standpoint of the Home Office. My first and pleasant duty is to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) first on her good fortune in drawing such a high place in the ballot—one can go through a lengthy political career without achieving a place—and secondly on introducing a Bill of considerable importance to English criminal law.

The Bill makes two useful provisions. It changes the criminal law so that it might better deal with the problem of public nuisance caused by kerb crawling and the grosser forms of sexual approach to women. Secondly, it upgrades the penalties for two criminal offences, on which the general view of the judiciary and others has been that the present range of penalties is set too low. My hon. Friend fully justified both those points in her excellent speech.

I am glad to see that the Bill appears to be welcomed by all those who spoke in this interesting and lively, though perhaps not uniformly well-informed, debate.

First, I shall draw attention to what seems to be the most serious practical matter that we must address, that is, the matters dealt with in clauses 1 to 3 rather than the matters about increasing penalties, to which I shall return later. We face a serious practical problem. Many urban areas that are otherwise perfectly pleasant residential areas are being turned into extremely unpleasant places for people to live a normal family life because of a decision by prostitutes, probably only a few at the outset, but whose numbers increase, to ply their trade on the streets, and a corresponding decision by men seeking the services of prostitutes to descend on that area at all hours of the day and night in motor vehicles or on foot.

That problem has been attested to by hon. Members from several of our major cities, including hon. Members from London and Birmingham. I enjoyed the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King). My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) knows the problem only too well because he was previously the leader of Wandsworth council. That borough has been represented in the debate by the hon. Members for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and for Tooting (Mr. Cox), and now by me. There is an especially acute problem in the Bedford hill area there. The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), who is a sponsor of the Bill, also made an effective speech.

As an hon. Member who represents an inner city area, I know that it is being made extremely difficult for people to live a civilised life in some areas of our cities because of sexual harassment. That is unacceptable. Parliament has a duty to find some form of redress, subject to all the usual safeguards and appropriate rules of our criminal law, which is much more distinguished and better thought out than ever appeared in the travesty of a speech from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). He appears to have disappeared at the moment that he led us to believe he was greatly anticipating—my opportunity to comment on his points, in so far as some of them merit it.

We know of the problem, for example, in Bedford hill from just one piece of evidence submitted to the Home Office. A questionnaire was sent out to the residents of Bedford hill, 345 of whom responded. Their answers give an idea of what it must be like to live there. Incidentally, Bedford hill is not a rundown or ramshackle area—not that the problem would be acceptable there, if it were—but a pleasant residential area, and the people living there value their amenities.

The questionnaire asked:

"Have you or any member of your family ever been accosted by a kerb crawler?"

The answers were: once, 30; often, 73; occasionally, 119; never, 113. Two thirds of the people asked had been accosted, or said that members of their families had been accosted, by a kerb crawler. The extent of their anger will be seen readily from the response to another question:

"Do you think it should be against the law for a man to accost a woman from a car for sexual purposes?"

In that case, 315 said yes and 21 said no.

Whatever hon. Members had disagreed about today, they cannot disagree that the present law of England is inadequate to deal with the problem. Therefore, do we take our courage in both hands and introduce the best law that we can to deal with the problem, or do we back away from the problem, saying that to take action would be unjust and unfair and that we should not do anything until we have tackled all legislation relating to sexual offences? That is the practical balance that Parliament must strike. The answer may be different according to the strength of evidence on either side.

That is why it was perfectly acceptable for the Wolfenden committee, when it considered the matter nearly 30 years ago, to recognise that, even then, there was a problem with kerb crawling. However, having considered the matter and concluded that it was not of the first importance at that time, the committee summed up the position by saying:

"Whilst we appreciate the reality of the problem, and we consider that it should be kept under review, the difficulties of proof would be considerable, and the possibility of a very damaging charge being levelled at an innocent motorist must also be borne in mind. We do not feel able to make any positive recommendation."

That view was acceptable in 1957, and it is clear that some still hold that view. However, on the evidence that I have, as a Home Office Minister and as a Member of Parliament in a borough with an especially acute problem —although happily not in my constituency—I no longer believe it can be argued that the balance of convenience has not tilted irrevocably in favour of change. That has happened gradually. The first blow that necessitated a new examination of the legislation was the decision in 1966 that a provision which until then had been used to try to deal with the problem was not applicable to soliciting for heterosexual intercourse, because that was not an immoral purpose under the Act.

The Labour Government in the mid-1970s set up an interdepartmental working group to consider the problem. It reported in 1976 and said that a new offence should be created to control kerb crawling and related behaviour on lines similar to those in my hon. Friend's Bill. Then questions were asked about the whole area of sexual offences and prostitution, and the then Home Secretary —I was delighted to see the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, West (Mr. Rees) briefly in the Chamber today—believed that, at that stage, the case for making changes in that area was not sufficiently compelling as to undermine the importance, if it were possible, of obtaining more wholesale changes in the legislation on sexual offences. He did so on reasonable grounds, and I do not criticise him. He invited the Criminal Law Revision Committee to consider the problem.

The committee did so with great care. It divided its consideration into sexual offences other than prostitution, on which it published a working paper in October 1980 and a report in April 1984, and offences relating to prostitution, on which it published a working paper in December 1982. In an act of kindness, for which I am grateful, and in response to an Adjournment debate initiated by the hon. Member for Tooting, the committee agreed to bring forward the publication of its final report so that the House could consider the problem of kerb crawling. Its report on prostitution offences committed in the street was published in August 1984, and we await its final report on other prostitution offences.

The committee took its time, not because it is not a hard-working body of men and women — the membership of the committee belies that suggestion— but because of the inherent difficulties of the matter. All criminal law is difficult, because it deals with human liberty, the maintenance of an orderly society and the balance between the two.

Sexual offences raise such particular problems that inevitably they must be among the most difficult to deal with, and that is why another far-sighted decision was taken which I, having inherited the decision rather than having created it, can warmly praise without appearing to be reflecting credit on myself.

Because of the social judgment which also needed to be made—they were not simply judgments for lawyers —a policy advisory committee was set up, drawing on the expertise of a number of professions, including psychiatrists, teachers and journalists, under the chairmanship of Lord Justice Waller, to advise the main Criminal Law Revision Committee on some of the social implications of any changes that the committee might suggest. I should have thought that that was a careful and considered way of dealing with the matter. It has led us to the point that we are at today.

Mr. Parris: Does my hon. Friend think that the Criminal Law Revision Committee is happy about its proposals?

Mr. Mellor: I have every reason to believe that the committee is unanimous. At one point in his speech my hon. Friend rather misled himself—though I admired the careful research that he had done—by looking only at the working party report and not at the later report. Indeed, the recommendations that have gone into clauses 1 to 3 were unanimous, not just on the part of the Criminal Law Revision Committee, but on the part of the policy advisory committee.

If by "happy" my hon. Friend is asking whether the members of the committee were dancing in the streets on the night that they made their recommendations, I would not care to say, but, in so far as they believed that their proposals represented the best view that they could take in trying to deal with the problem in a civilised, sensible and, above all, effective way, I believe that the answer is yes.

Much professional thought has gone into the production of the Bill and I am sure that we should all want to change our view if we thought for a moment that the Criminal Law Revision Committee was not content with the measure. The purpose of that committee is to make recommendations which we then hope Parliament will, on the whole, accept, and it is for Parliament and no other body to determine what should come within the law.

I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) to recognise—he did not appear to do so with the clarity that one might have hoped for in his speech, which was, as usual, lucid and well considered —that perhaps he underestimates the significant point that, in bringing forward her proposals, my hon. Friend the Member for Drake has followed to the letter the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee.

No one has a conclusive view to which we must all make obeisance, and I do not make my remarks in that light. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West, in an unholy alliance with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross, might allow a degree of modesty to enter into their judgment on this matter. They might then conclude that it is an issue worthy of some hesitation and that they should not pronounce in too determined a way the view that they have formed on what one imagines has been a more limited consideration of the legal problems that have arisen than that given to them by the Criminal Law Revision Committee. They might accept that their view on the law may not be better than that of the committee when dealing with such a technical matter. Even more important, my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West might agree that there are not necessarily easier ways of dealing with the issue.

Perhaps I should remind the House of the composition of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. Who would say of its chairman, Lord Justice Lawton, that there is a more distinguished lawyer in Britain? There were also Lord Justice Waller, Mr. Justice Lloyd — now Lord Justice Lloyd — Mr. Justice McCullough and Dr. Andrew Ashworth. Its membership included Professor Smith — one of the authors of "Criminal Law" — the foremost criminal lawyer in Britain with the arguable exception of Professor Glanville Williams.

The committee's membership included a whole range of circuit judges, stipendiary magistrates and the Director of Public Prosecutions, backed up by a policy advisory committee consisting of the Dean of King's college, London, a consultant psychiatrist, the assistant chief probation officer of inner London and a range of people with the social insights able to back up the necessary technical legal advice for which we look to the Criminal Law Revision Committee. That is the best that we can do after nearly a decade of studying the problem.

We have a choice. We have to ask ourselves whether Parliament needs to take action or whether the problems involved in taking action are so acute that we have to say to the people of Bedford hill, Southampton and Plymouth, "Sorry, it is too difficult to do something." If we say that we shall do something, we should not too readily think that these distinguished people have wasted a decade and are taking us down the wrong road. In the end, it will not help us if we say that we want the Bill, but we do not like any of its clauses. If this is to be an effective measure, we have to be sure that the details are right. I do not want to anticipate what I shall say in Committee, but there are points of detail that we would throw over at our peril.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because, as I have informed his Parliamentary Private Secretary, I have to get a train, so I shall not be able to hear all of his contribution. My hon. Friend may think that this principle is a good one, but I think that the worst possible way to establish a point is to say that the reason why it is good is that it has been established by experts. The more experts that arrive at a decision, the more suspicious I am of it. However, if one were to go up to a woman or a man in an English street and ask them an offensive question, whether it is, "Give me some money" or "Give me your body", is it the Minister's view that at present that is not an offence known to the law of England? If it is an offence known to the law of England, why do we need the Bill?

Mr. Mellor: My hon. and learned Friend may have a vested interest in dismissing the contribution of experts, but whether or not he thinks the law of England is materially, substantially or wholly inferior to the law of Scotland, it has been around for a number of centuries, and some of those most distinguished in it have lent us their advice for the purpose of drawing up the Bill. I dare say that Lord Justice Lawton and others will be disappointed that the Bill does not happen to commend itself to my hon. and learned Friend, but the gaps in English law that it seeks to address are well established through a number of judgments in our English courts, and, as far as we are concerned, that is the territory over which one has to operate.

I am not here to assert my views as a lawyer, so I shall resist the temptation to do other than say that the question that we are addressing today is whether there is a legal remedy at present for the offence of kerb crawling and some of the associated offences with particularly distressing and blatant sexual harassment of women. I shall make use of my limited time to address the questions put to me by a number of hon. Members who have been interested in this matter for a number of years. The answer to the question, on the authority of the Criminal Law Revision Committee and successive courts that have considered the matter, is no, and it is that problem that the Bill is seeking to address.

Quite rightly, a number of points have been made about the way in which the Bill might be applied if clauses 1 to 3 become law. The first point is about evidence. It is a basic rule of English law that it is for the court to determine whether evidence is probative, but if it is, the evidence of one man is enough to grant a conviction if he can give evidence sufficiently persuasive of the material points that make up the offence. It would be a grave step if we were to say that a police officer would not be suitable to give evidence that of itself was probative and persuasive to a court, but would have to have corroborative evidence from a private citizen. That would not be a helpful development, and I would counsel the House against it.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross has somewhat garbled the point about police evidence. There is no question of a police officer being able to give hearsay evidence, and English criminal law is quite as rigorous on that as is Scottish criminal law. However, if an officer, by reason of his observations, is able to give the court persuasive evidence that he is satisfied that the offence has been made out and he is not altered in his opinion by any other evidence, it is acceptable in this offence — as in any other offence, with a limited range of exceptions — that that evidence should carry the day if the court believes it, accepts it and thinks that the witness concerned has spoken the truth.

Of course, it is desirable for a member of the public who has been upset by an alleged criminal act to give evidence in court. If hon. Members had not insisted upon that, I should have argued the case myself. My hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), who made a wise speech, as always, was right to ask about that.

Police force orders relating to importuning state:

"Persons importuned who are not members of the police force should be asked to give their names and addresses and every effort should be made to persuade them to attend the court. If they refuse to do so a note should be made of the fact that the request was made."

If the Bill is passed, force orders will have to be extended to cover the enlarged territory of the Bill's provisions. I hope that every effort will be made in all proper cases, but we should not underestimate the difficulty of getting women to give evidence. Certainly a prostitute will have no incentive to give evidence. Some women who are not prostitutes might also be reluctant, particularly in view of the criminal infrastructure involved in running the rackets.

The worst thing that we can do is to think that we are closing a gap in the law, and instead festoon the Christmas tree with so many baubles that the Bill does not do the job that we want it to do.

I appreciate the many problems relating to ensuring that innocent people are not drawn in, and the problems of entrapment.

Mr. Soley: Persuading a witness to go to court is important. If there is no attempt to change the Bill in that direction in Committee, support for it will be more qualified. Not only should there be an attempt to get the witness to court, but the Bill should recognise that if a person is not willing to go to court the case should be regarded as dubious, particularly if it depends purely on police evidence. Even housing officials are reluctant to take action against a person who rents a house unless someone is willing to go to court and complain about behaviour. The law relating to prostitution is wide open to criticism in that respect.

Mr. Mellor: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is right. The evidence of a police officer is probative in almost every crime in the criminal calendar if his evidence is believed. But we shall cover this ground in Committee, and I shall welcome the opportunity to deal with the matter. I have taken advice, and I shall have even better advice for the Committee. If my advice changes, I shall inform hon. Members. If we require that unless the complainant gives evidence the charge cannot succeed, the measure's efficacy will be gravely undermined, and I doubt whether it will control the nuisance that it seeks to redress. We shall have this out in Committee.

The suggestion is that even if a court is convinced that a police officer is telling the truth when giving evidence which covers all the material points of an offence it should not accept that evidence but should require something more. That is a serious suggestion. It might just be a refined way of putting forward a basic anti-police prejudice to which I, as a Home Office Minister, will not give credence.

Mr. Soley: In no way is it an anti-police statement. To some extent it is designed to protect the police because they come under criticism. The point is that if this nuisance exists the person who is affected ought to be prepared to come and say so.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman is wrong in thinking that he can avoid the charge that it is anti-police, even though I accept that he does not intend it to be anti-police, by turning the police into second class witnesses.

Mr. Soley: No.

Mr. Mellor: Oh, yes, that is what the hon. Gentleman is doing. He is saying that if a man is not in uniform and is not a police officer that is all right but that if he is a police officer it is not enough. I can think of no conceivable basis upon which to differentiate this particular area of the criminal law from any other. Knowing of the trouble that his constituents in Bedford hill face, it is the interests of the constitutents of the hon. Member for Tooting that I am so anxious to try to protect. In many of these cases, it is not the woman who is suffering the nuisance. The prostitute is perfectly happy to be accosted.

Mr. Soley: I am not talking about prostitutes.

Mr. Mellor: I know that the hon. Gentleman is not talking about prostitutes, but to some extent we are talking about prostitutes. The menace that the hon. Member for Tooting laid before me so eloquently — indeed so eloquently that I am wholly persuaded and now advance the case, if anything, with as much enthusiasm as does he — is that if a gang of prostitutes descends upon a residential area and the prostitutes are then accosted from cars, one cannot say that it is just the prostitutes who are causing the nuisance and that if the prostitutes are not prepared to go before the courts no nuisance has been created and there can be no conviction. It is the rest of the people, who sometimes have to suffer acts of prostitution in their own front gardens, who are offended. Therefore, in order to stop men going there like flies round a honey pot, one has to do something to make the honey a little less attractive. Therefore, one should make those men liable to be arrested and convicted of an offence which, as has rightly been pointed out, would carry considerable problems for them, far above and beyond any penalty that could be imposed by the courts. If one insists upon the woman giving evidence there is no way in which this can be an effective measure, and half of the problems of Bedford hill will not be dealt with. I look to the hon. Member for Hammersmith for support during the Committee stage, and I hope that I shall get it.

Mr. Soley: The argument is not about "the woman". If I said "the woman" it was an error, and I apologise for it. The point is that we need corroborative evidence. Before the housing department of a local authority will evict a family for being a nuisance, it requires other people to go to court to say that they have experienced a nuisance and to say what that nuisance is. In addition to the police officer, somebody who lives in the street and who has been troubled by the nuisance must be prepared to go and say what the problem is. It is not just the prostitute about whom we are talking.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman is plucking a particular point out of the civil law and saying that it should apply to the criminal law. I am saying to the hon. Gentleman that on this occasion, although he is well informed on many other matters, he may be misleading himself. If he is saying that an adjoining resident would give evidence about general nuisance, I should have thought that that would be prejudicial to the defendant. If he was not giving evidence about a specific incident but said that a great deal of nuisance was being caused, this could only be thought to be prejudicial to the individual who was being charged. If a great deal of nuisance was taking place, it would be said that he was just one of those who was affected. We shall have to leave this matter until the Committee stage. However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will think long and hard before trying to persuade the House to attach such a provision to the Bill. After nearly 30 years we are doing something about the problem. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not attempt to attach provisions that would mean that the misery of Bedford hill will not be removed.

I was slightly puzzled by one of the references to the agent provocateur. There have been one or two debates on the subject during the past 12 months. I tried to make clear on those occasions — and upon another occasion my hon. Friend the Minister of State attempted to do the same — the view that the Government take about the agent provocateur. Plainly there should be no entrapment in this or in any other offence. Plainly in relation to the necessary observation duties strict rules have to be applied. When this matter was last raised on 29 October — I shall remind the House of it because it is relevant — I quoted from the Metropolitan police orders:

"'Officers selected for these duties'"—

plain clothes duties—

"'must be briefed by a senior officer to ensure that they avoid behaviour which could give rise to legitimate accusations that they had acted as agents provocateurs. The term agent provocateur was defined by the Royal Commission on Police Powers in 1928 as a person who entices another to commit an express breach of the law which he would not otherwise have committed and then proceeds to inform against him in respect of such an offence'."

I went on to say,

"In general, no one should be arrested solely on account of behaviour towards police officers, although if the offence is particularly flagrant, arrest may be necessary." — [Official Report, 29 October 1984; Vol. 65, c. 1118-19.]

I hope that those remarks, which clearly state our view on agents provocateurs, are of assistance to those who have rightly raised the point today.

My only additional comment is that if a lot of police women dressed up in provocative clothes and waved at motor vehicles in the street, and a poor driver stopped, it would plainly be wrong for him then to be charged with an offence under this section, even though this is one of the difficulties with which we must contend — the defence of agent provocateur is not known to English law.

If, in an area—say in Bedford hill—where it is well known that prostitution and kerb crawling take place, a woman, perfectly normally dressed, should walk down a road as if she were any other woman going home to her family, and if she did nothing to draw attention to herself beyond doing what has been commended — a woman exercising the rights of any citizen to walk along a road —the fact that that woman was a police officer, trying to deal with the problem of kerb crawling, would not make her an agent provocateur. Before people condemn that practice, they must ask themselves whether we want the law to be effective and enforced and whether we want hope to be finally given to areas like Bedford hill. If so, we should pass a law that not only says that it addresses the problem, but one that does.

Clauses 1 and 2 address the problem of the man who solicits a woman for the purposes of prostitution, both in his motor vehicle and, if he chooses to evade the law by leaving his motor vehicle, when he is walking down the street. I notice what was said about clause 1(1)(b). I can understand some of the points that were made about the somewhat inelegant expression there and we shall see what we can do about it, but it may be that it is inelegant for a good reason.

I appreciate that when we come to clause 3 we are dealing with a different and more difficult area. Clause 3 deals with the grosser forms of sexual harassment of women, falling short of anything that would be criminal. One does not have to talk to many women who travel around London or some of our other great cities who have been alone on a tube train at night, in a railway carriage, walking down a street, or in some other situation, to find those who have been subjected to something that goes far beyond the natural inclination of a man to talk to a pretty girl and which becomes a gross form of sexual harassment of a kind about which there is a real issue as to whether it should be made criminal. That may happen in a cinema and a range of other places off the street. We must consider whether we want such an offence, and if so, do we want it to be as widely drawn as it presently is.

I shall reserve my detailed comments to Committee, but I hope that it will be borne in mind that in arriving at its conclusion on that the Criminal Law Revision Committee did so only after a great deal of heart-searching and careful advice from the Policy Advisory Committee. In the end, it was unanimously recommended because the committee believed that the points that were being made from a wide range of women's groups to the Policy Advisory Committee could not and should not be ignored.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Drake will be able to enlist more lady Members to contribute in our debates before too many men jump in with hobnail boots and start laughing about the manner in which clause 3 is phrased. We know that every day women are being faced with such problems that are bitterly resented, and that they were delighted when they heard that the Criminal Law Revision Committee was taking note of their concerns and that the Government were taking that up.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West criticised the phrase

"manner likely to cause her fear".

If members of the committee had been here, that would have been one of the occasions—there would have been a number during his speech — when they would have liked to box his ears soundly. He suggested that the committee did that simply to facilitate the police giving evidence and the need not to call a complainant. That is far from the case. The measure imports an element of objectivity into the approach so that the question of whether a criminal offence is committed does not depend upon the particular and possibly idiosyncratic reaction of the propositioned woman.

I make my final point because I know that sporting gentlemen are assembling for their debate, and I want to leave Members some time to consider lighter matters. I attach a great deal of importance to clause 4. I do not believe it should be overlooked, even though it has not drawn the controversy—except by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross—that clauses 1 to 3 have drawn.

We attach a great deal of importance to increasing the penalties for attempted rape. There is no logical reason — especially after the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 which equated the penalty for attempts generally with the penalty for the completed offence—why attempted rape should be excluded from increased penalties, especially since the attempt, from the point of view of the offender, may be a more serious offence than the concluded act. In an attempt, the man must always have the intention to conclude the offence. That is not, of course, true in the case of the offence of murder, where an intention to cause grievous bodily harm suffices. In the case of attempted murder, there must be an intention to kill.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Drake made only too clear, the fact that the man does not complete the act he intends to carry out is often wholly fortuitous. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that the life sentence exists to protect the public. Indeed, often it exists to protect the offender from himself, and that is why life sentences are passed. A number of life sentences for rape are passed every year. I believe it is right for the court to have that power in dealing with attempted rape.

Many members of the judiciary have long recognised that a penalty of only two years for indecent assault is no longer justified. I can do no better than remind the House of what was said in the tragic case in 1982 where a respectable women was murdered by a young man only 13 weeks after he, with a history of sexual misbehaviour, was released from prison after serving a two-year sentence for indecent assault. There seems little doubt that, if the court had had the power to sentence him for a longer period, it would have done so on the basis of the unacceptable threat he posed, and would pose in the foreseeable future, to the public.

The consequence of a two-year maximum term — rather than a longer term—being available was that the man was released and the life of an innocent woman was taken. As that man is in prison facing what I imagine will be one of the longest sentences—unless the assessment of his propensity to commit these offences diminishes over the years—one wonders whether the court did him a favour by trying him for an offence that merited only a two-year term. There are occasions when age brings greater maturation and when one can be more confident about a person's ability to cope with sexual stress.

I hope that, by increasing the penalty to 10 years, we shall deal with the problem caused by the low penalties for indecent assault. That does not, of course, mean that every offence of indecent assault will merit imprisonment for longer than the existing maximum, but the legislation will enable the judge, when he is concerned not just at the gravity of the offence but at the threat the man's behaviour might pose in the future, to pass an appropriate sentence.

This has been a long debate. I hope that, in speaking as I have and in finding myself with many other points that could usefully have been made, I have not outstayed my welcome. I wanted to justify my strongly held view that this is an important and worthwhile Bill which deserves to be supported by the House and which, I hope, will receive a unanimous Second Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

Sports Fields and Recreational Facilities Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

2.15 pm

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

There will be some disappointment outside this place that we are allowed so little time on this important subject. However, I hope to be able to cover a fair amount of the Bill in the short time that is available to me. The Bill has the support of many colleagues on both sides of the Chamber. It has also the support and sponsorship of the Central Council for Physical Recreation, the National Playing Fields Association, the Football Association, the London Sports Council Standing Committee, the Fair Play for Children organisation and many other community groups and individuals who have been in touch with me over the past few weeks. In particular, I give a word of thanks to Mr. Peter Lawson, the general secretary of the CCPR, and Mr. Nigel Hook, its technical officer, who have given me enormous help in preparing the Bill.

Some concern has been expressed in this place and outside for some time that some of our playing fields and sports fields are at risk to the developers. The CCPR produced a leaflet some months ago entitled "Sports Fields at Risk", which was circulated to virtually every hon. Member. There are fields that are owned by local education authorities and used by schools, fields that are owned by private commercial companies, fields that are owned by nationalised industries and fields that are owned by Government agencies, including the Ministry of Defence. The Bill seeks to encourage the dual use of these fields. It takes up a Conservative party manifesto commitment and, indeed, commitments which have been entered into by both the Conservative and Labour parties over the years. It seeks to widen our knowledge of how many of the fields are at risk and how many are being put up for development. It seeks also to form a sports register that will be similar to the land register, which will enable my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to know precisely the amount of land that is being used for recreation and for sport. Such a register will give him a greater opportunity to implement effective monitoring.

The House will be aware that school playing fields are regulated under Department of Education and Science regulation No. 909, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State when he was at the Department of Education and Science. The regulation is designed to reassess the need for playing fields for pupils and access to those facilities. It provides a definite requirement that schoolchildren should have a certain area of playing facilities.

A problem has arisen over the past few years, which is quite understandable. As school rolls begin to fall, and continue to fall, certain education authorities may take the opportunity to use the decline as an excuse to develop the land that is now used as playing fields. This has put the playing fields at risk. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said in November 1981 in the course of a speech at Bournemouth:

> "In the longer term, I accept that the total area of playing fields at schools may well be reduced."

That is the problem that we face.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I understand that there is a problem of time, and I hope that the Government will not take advantage of it. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be feasible for local authorities in the position that he has described to make surplus playing fields available for youth and adult recreation, and that there is no obligation on them to make playing fields available for residential or other development?

Mr. Carlisle: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. If he reads the later part of my Bill, he will find that that is covered by clause 4.

There is concern that, as school rolls fall—they are falling considerably in some areas—there will be great temptation to sell off the land for development. There is even greater concern that, as the rolls start to rise, as undoubtedly they will, although admittedly not to previous levels, the fields will have gone, and gone for ever.

It is remarkable that since the Bill was launched in December I have had several instances put before me where local authorities have put up land for sale, to the detriment of the needs of those living in the local areas. For example, at Beeston, Nottinghamshire, the Roundhill playing fields, comprising about 1·53 acres, were proposed for development by the local authority. This has caused great consternation among the local residents and a large petition has been collected. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) has become involved in the campaign. The campaigners voice the fears of many others in similar situations. They lacked knowledge because of the secrecy of the council. They argue that the amenity will be lost for ever and that the first that they learnt of the proposal was from information in the press.

Instances have also been mentioned to me by Members from Sussex, Derbyshire, Shrewsbury, Cambridgeshire and south Glamorgan, and many more can be cited. There are certainly too many to ignore. That is one of the reasons why the Bill has been introduced.

The problem is perhaps most acute in inner city areas. Members from London constituencies will be interested to hear that a couple of days ago I received a letter from the head of the physical education department of a comprehensive school in Brixton referring to the risk of depriving future generations of the pleasure of playing on grass pitches and thereby condemning them to the concrete jungle. He goes on to talk about poor and unrealistic facilities and says that some clubs in the area are now running fewer teams due to the lack of facilities. I am sure that many local councils in London are now under great pressure from residents to retain existing playing fields and sports facilities. Further difficulties may have been caused by the recent ILEA edict that schoolchildren should not travel more than 20 minutes from their school for outside activities, which may mean that children from some schools never play on a grass pitch.

Time precludes my listing the many other owners of sports fields, including nationalised industries, London Regional Transport, British Rail and the Ministry of Defence. One must ask the Government whether any of those bodies is under instruction to sell because of the financial constraints understandably imposed upon them.

The largest proportion of playing fields are owned by private companies and are under real threat. It is difficult to deal with this through legislation beyond merely seeking to persuade companies not to sell off their facilities. The number of employees may have fallen considerably, and the firm's viability may depend upon selling off the playing fields. In this context, I welcome the approach made by my hon. Friend the Minister to the 100 top employers in this country and the good response that he received. They have shown great co-operation with his initiative and I hope that he will continue that worthwhile exercise.

The Bill consists of four modest clauses. Clause 1 encourages the dual use of facilities. Here, research is encouraging and there is no doubt that some local authorities have taken heed of the efforts of previous Governments and the CCPR to encourage the sharing of facilities among local community groups. The facilities may not be exactly suitable for those who wish to use them, and extra costs may arise in relation to caretakers, groundsmen and so on, but I am encouraged to note that many firms and schools have taken on board the concept of multiple use.

We must consider how we may better publicise the idea of multiple use and encourage schools and private companies to put forward their own ideas and encourage more local sports clubs to use the existing facilities. It is sad to note that in Birmingham, for example, the local county football association has had to refuse 44 applications from clubs wishing to join the league because there are not enough pitches. One wonders whether pitches are in fact available in schools and private grounds, but are being held back for some reason. There is no doubt that the demand for these pitches exists. My Bill does not seek to compel schools or private companies to make them available, but if they are not made available the time for compulsion may come.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Should not the Bill be regarded as a step towards increasing participation in sport, by retaining facilities that might otherwise be lost?

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend is right. Existing facilities should be retained—that is the guts of the Bill. In certain areas of the country—I do not want to raise a national alarm—there is a real threat, and such facilities are now subject to the ambitions of the developer and the builder.

The second clause provides for the notification of the development that is to take place and makes it obligatory that the issuing of a certificate under the existing planning legislation should be notified to interested sports bodies. That would put an end to the accusations of secrecy that have been made, and, in a sensitive area, would clear the air. Local newspapers would carry large advertisements of the fact that the land was to be developed. The clause would ensure full public knowledge of the opinions and intentions of local authorities and others interested and, I hope, provide an opportunity for consultation. Clause 2 also provides that the Secretary of State should be notified of any impending development.

Clause 3 suggests the formation of a sports register. It gives the Secretary of State the opportunity — nothing more — to compile a sports register if he thinks fit. Previous attempts to compile a sports register have foundered for various reasons. In 1977 the Department of the Environment issued a document entitled "Amenity Grasslands" which listed the areas of grassland in existence. The regional sports councils also attempted to make their own survey some years ago, but got bogged down.

It is important that such a register should be compiled. It could be administered by existing machinery, perhaps through the Sports Council, which is in a way an arm of Government, or through the CCPR, which has already said that it would be prepared to run the register. All inspections of the register would be paid for by the inspectors, and in that way, I hope, the overall cost could be kept down. I do not want to increase Government expenditure.

Clause 4 is brief. It is intended to make more land available to sporting charities. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to this problem. The clause would help to ensure that the profits of the sales of grounds are devoted only to sporting purposes. It should be of benefit to the National Playing Fields Association and other charitable organisations.

The Bill forms part of the process of encouraging people to participate more actively in sports. We should encourage the Sports Council, which has been responsible for various campaigns, including, recently, "Ever Thought of Sport?". We should be a more active nation. About £0·5 million was spent on that campaign, and it would be a tragedy if the fields and pitches were not available for those influenced by it.

The Bill would ensure also that future generations of schoolchildren have the opportunity to play on grass pitches. Local education authorities must be aware that school rolls will rise again, and they must take care before they offer surplus land for development.

Lastly, I want to arrest the decline in the national sporting arena. Our great national sports, such as cricket, association football and rugby football, have suffered over the years for various reasons, including perhaps the lack of grass pitches. We have plenty of hard pitches and indoor facilities. I hope that the Bill, if passed, will improve our national and international sporting status.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The Opposition welcome the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle). The only pity is that the hon. Gentleman had not been converted to this course by 1980. Prior to the passage of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, much of the land was protected. Following the passage of that Act, it has been easy to dispose of land vitally needed for sport and recreation.

We are happy to support the hon. Gentleman, but I wish that he had been converted a little earlier. As a result of changes made by the Government, local authorities are giving themselves planning permission and then selling the land at its enhanced value. That would not have been possible before the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. It is clear that much land, especially in the London area, is threatened. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment knows that land near Cheam in his constituency is affected. The same is true for London, Edgware and London, Richmond. There is a long list—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 15 February.

PROHIBITION OF FEMALE CIRCUMCISION BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 1 February.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Brunei and Maldives Bill [Lords], notices of Amendments, new Clauses, and new schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Building Industry (Black Economy)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): The House has spent much of the day discussing the grave public nuisance caused by one part of the black economy —the one with scarlet edges. I am pleased to have the opportunity to draw attention to another part of it which is far more extensive and has a much wider impact on the public—the black economy in the building trade.

The Keith committee report on enforcement powers of the revenue departments, which was published in 1983, defines the black economy as

"all activities which are concealed from the revenue collecting authorities with the specific intention of avoiding tax".

The size of the black economy in the United Kingdom is impossible to estimate precisely. Sir Lawrence Airey has estimated that it is between 6 and 8 per cent. of gross domestic product. If it was 7 per cent. of last year's gross domestic product of £305·7 billion, it would have been worth more than £21 billion. The tax loss on that sum could have been as high as £6 billion. Those large figures show that the public think that the taxes they are expected to pay are far too high. The size of the black economy is strong evidence of the need to reduce the overall level of taxation.

What proportion of the black economy is in the building industry? The Federation of Master Builders estimates that it is 20 per cent., or £1 billion a year in lost taxes. That estimate is regarded as low by the Building Employers Confederation, and as very low by the National Home Improvement Council. The debate is therefore about what is being done, or can be done, to bring that lost revenue into the Treasury, so enabling tax cuts to be made all round.

The black economy in the building trade is a problem because of lost revenue, which means that everyone else must pay more, and because consumers, normally private householders, suffer greatly from delayed or shoddy workmanship for which they can often gain no redress. It is inevitable that only a small proportion of dissatisfied customers complain to the Office of Fair Trading. However, more than 24,000 complained in 1981, more than 28,000 complained in 1982, more than 36,000 complained in 1983 and 23,015 complained in the first six months of 1984. Those are the figures for consumer complaints about construction, double glazing and house insulation work and are published in the Official Report of 21 November 1984, at column 186.

Such a high level of consumer dissatisfaction brings the building industry into disrepute. The public are largely ignorant of the risks involved in the lack of redress when cowboy builders are involved. They do not think about the implications of the builder having no insurance and do not understand the complexities of value added tax. They regard "No VAT" in a builder's advertisement as an attractive inducement, rather than as a warning of pitfalls.

Examples of the gullibility of the public abound. Yesterday's Daily Telegraph reported a case at Oxford Crown court, in which a 64-year-old woman paid £11,350 —almost her life's savings—to a contractor who spent two days relaying a drive, tidying paths, lopping trees and demolishing two sheds. She then had to pay a further £739 to have the shoddy work put right. It was estimated that if the work had been done by a respectable builder in the first place the bill would not have been even as high as the £739 that she had to pay to have the work put right.

The black economy in the building trade is bad for the general body of taxpayers, for consumers and for those who work in the industry. The unfair competition from those who are not registered for VAT puts pressure on legitimate building employers to reduce their overheads by employing more self-employed labour and by cutting training.

I understand that the Department of Employment has evidence that that self-employment in the building industry has increased by 13 per cent. during the past two years. I recognise and applaud the fact that many people want to assume the risks and responsibilities of being their own boss and being self-employed. However, there are many skilled and unskilled building workers who would prefer the security of being employees, so that they can be eligible for sick pay and unemployment benefit in the event of losing their employment.

It is always easier for politicians to state a problem than it is to provide a remedy, but a remedy must be found. I look forward to hearing from my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury of the Government's efforts to combat the escalation of black economy activity in the building trade. I would particularly welcome his observations on two suggestions.

My first suggestion is that the Government should eliminate the areas in which the Treasury not only loses income in the black economy, but actually helps to fund it. Home improvements are big business. The report of the Building Material Producers forecasting panel of November 1984 estimated that repair, maintenance and improvement work represented about 40 per cent. of total output in the construction industry, compared with only 25 per cent. in 1970.

Much of that business expansion is funded by taxpayers and ratepayers through grants or subsidised by tax relief on loans. The Government should insist that taxpayers' subsidy should go only to those who have their repair, maintenance and improvement work carried out by VAT-registered builders, and preferably by builders who participate in the welcome new initiative of the Building Employers Confederation, that is, its guarantee scheme. For a small additional premium—about 1 per cent. of building costs—a person who is having building work carried out has a guarantee against the builder going bust or the work proving to be defective within a specified period.

At present, some local authorities are paying grant money on estimates rather than on receipts. That seems incredible when we say that the public sector must get good value for money. Even more local authorities are paying grant money which will end up in the pockets of evaders.

My second suggestion is that the Government should recognise the reality that registration for VAT is a major disadvantage to a jobbing builder in quoting for small private work. As a result, small builders do not register, although the law requires registration where annual turnover reaches £18,700. The Government must recognise that it is virtually impossible to conduct a legitimate business in the building industry with a turnover of less than £18,700 a year. Yet, by having a threshold, evasion is encouraged and proof of evasion is hampered.

It would be much simpler to have the VAT threshold reduced to zero. Then any jobbing builder who is not registered can be prosecuted solely on proof of working as the sole proprietor for reward.

The extent of VAT evasion is breathtaking. A recent survey of classified newspaper advertisements for building services from newspapers throughout the country showed that between 70 per cent. and 75 per cent. of those advertising building services were unregistered for VAT. Many newspapers carried blatant display advertisements boasting, "No VAT." The position is farcical.

The Customs and Excise must mount a major investigation to prove turnover in excess of £18,700 to obtain a conviction. Its job would be much easier if the threshold were nil. Belgium and Italy have nil limits on registration for VAT, and in most other European countries the registration threshold is much lower than that in Britain.

Some people have lobbied for a higher VAT threshold and argue that lowering the threshold would simply increase administrative costs, but a nil VAT threshold for all those undertaking building work for reward is the only way to ensure that we deal with this aspect of the black economy.

In his foreword to the White Paper on the calculation of VAT, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"Traders who conscientiously comply with their legal obligations must not be put at a disadvantage compared with their competitors who do not."

At present, traders who conscientiously comply with their legal obligations are put at a disadvantage. On the basis of what my right hon. Friend said, I hope that when he decides his Budget he will think seriously about the strong case for reducing the VAT threshold to nil. The threshold need not be reduced for areas other than the building industry, if there are strong arguments against that. I limit my submissions to the building industry.

The Government must take the matter more seriously. If the estimate of Kent Matthews of Liverpool university, writing in Economic Affairs in July 1983, is anywhere near correct, about one third of those included in unemployment statistics are actively involved in the black economy. If benefit fraud is added to the loss of tax and VAT, the financial implications are even more serious. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to assure the House that the Chancellor will seek to eliminate the inducements to tax evasion that undoubtedly exist in the building trade.

2.42 pm

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on raising this important matter. He property concentrated upon the tax aspects of it, although he said something about the consumer aspects. He will understand that his comments about standards should be addressed to my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Department of the Environment, and I shall ensure that their attention is drawn to his remarks. If appropriate, I am sure that they will be in direct contact with him.

I shall concentrate on tax, and I endorse warmly my hon. Friend's proper criticism of cowboy operators in the black economy who evade their lawful tax obligations. There can be no justification for such actions, and the Revenue Departments deserve our full support in taking action against those involved. My hon. Friend referred to VAT. It is important to keep in sight the dual nature of the problem, which involves income tax as well as VAT. By definition, it is impossible to quantify precisely the extent of the black economy, although my hon. Friend mentioned some estimates.

Because of the different tax thresholds, it is worth stressing the fact that the problem bites first on the income tax side. An odd-jobber must have a turnover of more than £18,700 a year — about £350 a week — before VAT becomes chargeable. On the income tax side, on the other hand, personal thresholds start at just under £40 a week for single and at just over £60 a week for married people.

With VAT there is also an inbuilt incentive to register in that only then can input tax — all the VAT that the builder pays for his equipment and supplies — be refunded. It is, therefore, in his interest to register.

As my hon. Friend concentrated on the VAT aspect, I shall deal with that. There are two main ways in which VAT is evaded. The black economy, cowboys, moonlighters and similar phrases are used rather loosely when speaking of these matters, but basically there are two categories of evasion of VAT liability.

The first is when work is done for cash and suppressed by VAT-registered businesses. VAT is lost on the total price of the job unless the purchase of the VAT-paid materials used is also suppressed. That is where businesses are properly registered but do cash transactions.

Secondly, VAT is lost when work is done by people unregistered for VAT but whose turnover is such that they should be registered, and my hon. Friend referred to that category. VAT is lost on the labour element of the job but not normally on the materials, which are bought VAT-paid unless the builder's merchant is also in on the racket and is selling materials for cash without keeping records.

There is a third category of people who do not pay VAT and who take advantage of the registration limit of £18,700, but they do that legitimately. From the VAT point of view, that group includes not only many part-timers or moonlighters who trade in their spare time or when temporarily unemployed, but small-time traders and craftsmen who can make a reasonable living without going over the limit, possibly aided by the device of getting the customer to buy the materials for the job, thus keeping low the turnover of a one-man business.

Some in that category may be evading income tax and national insurance, and I have mentioned that problem. I assure my hon. Friend that the Inland Revenue is doing all it can to pursue that type of tax evasion in the black economy by the cowboys and moonlighters. However, they are not evading VAT if their turnover is genuinely below the £18,700 limit.

It is sometimes argued that unregistered traders with a small turnover are competing with VAT-registered traders. That is not peculiar to the construction industry. The logic of the argument is that the registration limit is too high, or at least too high for the services trades, and I shall return to that shortly.

The existence of that category of people trading below the VAT threshold makes it more difficult for the Customs and Excise to get evidence against unregistered people who should be registered. When challenged by the Customs and Excise, they can say, "My turnover is nothing like £18,700", and if the bulk of their trading is for cash and there are no records available for the Customs and Excise to prove the suspected illegality, that leads to difficulties, and extended investigation might be required to establish that fraud is taking place.

My hon. Friend suggested ways in which Government action could help reduce the amount of fraud and evasion. He suggested, for example, that the whole of the improvement repair grants operation should be confined to VAT-registered building contractors. However, this is primarily a question for Department of the Environment Ministers.

It would be difficult to insist that all home improvement and repair grants had to go to VAT registered dealers, as I am sure it would lead to the charge that we were discriminating against the small man, perhaps just setting up in business on his own, and quite properly not yet liable to VAT registration. I know from what my hon. Friend said about the importance of small businesses that he would be loth to incur such a charge.

One has also to bear in mind the needs of the do-it-yourself householder, who might be able to do the bulk of the work himself with the assistance of one or two skilled craftsmen who might or might not be registered. I understand that the Department of the Environment will be issuing a consultation document on home improvements policy soon. If I have been reading my papers correctly, there was some reference to this in the White Paper on public expenditure that came out this week.

Mr. Chope: Will my hon. Friend accept that it is open to anybody who is trading as a sole proprietor to register for VAT? If it is thought that that might be unfair on some traders who do not yet have the £18,700 turnover, they could still register for VAT, as they do in my profession. Every barrister registers for VAT, even when he is obviously earning a lot less than that.

Mr. Hayhoe: Such registration causes a lot of extra work for the Customs and Excise, because registration for VAT is being seen as a badge of importance. If one is not registered for VAT, people assume that one's turnover cannot be £18,700. In the legal profession people are presumably concerned with that appearance, as they are in other professions. There are problems in insisting, as my hon. Friend has suggested, that the improvement and repairs grants system should work only through VAT registered traders, but this is a matter for the Department of the Environment Ministers, and I shall draw my hon. Friend's comments to their attention.

The main effort of the Customs and Excise is directed at controlling and investigating suppression by VAT registered traders—that is the cash payments that are not in the records and lead to evasion of tax liability. In the building and construction industries, the abolition of the pre-1984 liability borderline between standard-rated repairs and zero-rated alterations allows the Customs and Excise to concentrate on the main task of seeking out suppression. The old borderline provided rather an easy method of evasion, in that if repair work was misdescribed as being alterations the work changed over from being standard rated to zero rated and a fraud took place. Undoubtedly, some people exploited those opportunities for evasion, which have been removed by the changes that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made in the last Budget.

Enforcement of the £18,700 registration requirement is rather more difficult. It is time-consuming to get adequate evidence of failure to register, and the amount of tax, even if arrears can be recovered, is relatively small. Controlled visits to registered premises are much more cost effective in bringing in under-declarations and arrears of tax—that is the experience of the Customs and Excise. Nevertheless, it is co-operating in a study in selected locations with the Building Employers Confederation designed to establish the size of the problem and the number of people who are unregistered but are offering their building services to the public.

The Customs and Excise will then do an in-depth study into one of those areas to try to establish the proportion that is unlawfully trading above the registration limit. When this research has been completed, we shall have a clearer picture of whether more resources should be devoted to policing the registration limit or whether other solutions might be considered. As my hon. Friend knows, as part of its 1985 Budget submission, the BEC is asking for a reduced rate of VAT to about 5 per cent. on all work—alterations, improvements and repairs to existing buildings. It also wants a nil registration limit for the building trade. The object is to ensure that all people supplying building services are liable to register and account for VAT.

My hon. Friend knows that I cannot be drawn on the question of a reduced rate in this period before the Budget. I am in pre-Budget purdah and anything that I say, or anything that I do not say, cannot be taken to mean that the Chancellor will do anything, or not do anything, in his Budget later in the year. I intend to give no indications and no inference should be drawn from what I say.

The introduction of a second positive rate of VAT for construction alone would probably involve a revenue cost and certainly an administrative cost. Both would have to be taken into account when coming to a decision.

A nil registration limit for the construction industry would be a draconian measure with a vengeance. It would catch every odd job man who supplemented his earnings by occasional evening or weekend work. It would have to be enforced. If such people were successfully registered they would have to be controlled and their VAT returns and remittances would have to be investigated. The flurry of correspondence to hon. Members complaining about the bureaucracy, rules and form-filling would be alarming.

As my hon. Friend acknowledged, most of the representations received by the Treasury are in the reverse direction. We are asked for a substantial increase in the registration limit. At Question Time yesterday I was pressed to increase the limit and I had to make it clear that to do that would lead us into conflict with European Community law and was not possible. I accept that there is a balance. Some people would be disadvantaged by such an increase, and others would be advantaged.

We shall keep an open mind about changing the registration requirements for the building industry along the lines that my hon. Friend suggests. I do not want to arouse either fears or expectations that changes will be made. We should await the studies to which I referred earlier.

The extra resources which the Inland Revenue is devoting to detecting moonlighters and cowboys might not only provide Customs officers with evidence of people trading above the present threshold, but might provide valuable information on the scale of trading at various levels below the threshold. That should help us to decide whether a special VAT registration limit for the construction industry is justified. I stress that departure from a uniform limit would result in a more complicated system for the Customs and Excise to administer and for traders to understand.

The Federation of Master Builders made a suggestion which would have allowed householders paying VAT on the upkeep of their property to claim relief from VAT on their bills against their income tax liability. This would have been a kind of schedule A relief, without a corresponding schedule A charge. The Federation of Master Builders saw this as a scheme to remove the incentive for householders to use unregistered cowboys who were not charging VAT, but, alas, I see little or no merit in practice in a scheme like this. It would cost a great deal of revenue. It would also introduce another special and administratively costly relief into the income tax structure, whereas our policy is to simplify the system.

Like any law enforcement agency, the Customs and Excise needs reliable information about the people who are evading their VAT responsibilities. There is plenty of anecdotal evidence about the scale of the black economy, but the Customs and Excise needs more hard facts about transactions where VAT is evaded. I hope that those who hear of this debate will do what they can, if they are involved in any way, to ensure that the information is provided so that the Customs and Excise can take action and the community as a whole can deal with those people — the cowboys in the black economy — who are unlawfully evading their tax liabilities.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

ENVIRONMENT

Waltham Forest Council

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what money will be available to Waltham Forest council in 1985-86 for home improvement and other grants for the renovation of older houses; and what were the comparable figures for 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Sir George Young: Waltham Forest council received a housing investment programme allocation of £8·270 million for 1985-86, which it can supplement with the prescribed proportion of capital receipts. The allocation for 1983-84 and 1984-85 were £8·622 million and £8·445 million respectively. Decisions on priorities as between renovation and other housing activities are for the council.

Water Pollution

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects his working party to report on how best to make available to the public information on pollution held by water authorities and local councils.

Mr. Waldegrave: By the end of the year.

Rate Capping

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the measures he has adopted and details of the estimates and calculations he has made together with the respective totals of resources held by each of the rate-capped local authorities in the area of Greater London.

Mr. Waldegrave: The authorities selected for rate limitation in 1985-86 have until 15 January to comment on the rate and precept limits we have proposed. My right hon. Friend will be happy to discuss the manner of calculation of the proposed limits, and any assumptions made in that calculation, in the context of negotiations about alternative limits proposed by the individual authorities.

Urban Programme

Mr. Lightbown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources he is proposing to make available under the urban programme in 1985-86 to partnership and programme authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Despite the great pressure on public expenditure this year I am providing all the partnership and programme authorities with the same cash levels of resources in 1985-86 as they were allocated for 1984-85 at about this time last year. This demonstrates the Government's strong continuing commitment to improve the quality of life in the hard pressed areas of our cities. Additional resources, over and above these allocations, will be available to the authorities for approved urban development grant (UDG) schemes. The total sum being allocated to these authorities (excluding UDG and derelict land grant (DLG)) is £224 million and is made up as follows:

Partnerships	£m
Birmingham	24·5
Hackney	12·0
Islington	10·4
Lambeth	13·5
Liverpool	24·1
Manchester/Salford	24·5
Newcastle/Gateshead	18·0
Programme authorities
Blackburn	3·6
Bolton	3·59
Bradford	4·58
Brent	4·5
Coventry	4·3
Hammersmith and Fulham	5·63
Kingston upon Hull	4·47
Knowsley	3·7
Leeds	4·13
Leicester	5·43
Middlesborough	4·62
Nottingham	4·85
Oldham	3·66
Rochdale	3·6
Sandwell	4·5
Sheffield	4·01
Sunderland	3·17
Tower Hamlets	4·5
North Tyneside	3·12
South Tyneside	3·93
Wandsworth	4·5
Wirral	3·67
Wolverhampton	4·84

As in previous years, allocations are made subject to the quality of the detailed programmes submitted.

House Sales

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of what steps he expects local authorities to take to follow up on the sale of houses following the gaining of house improvement grants.

Sir George Young: Local authorities are responsible for administration of the home improvement grant system. Where sales breach the grant conditions specified in section 73 of the Housing Act 1974 (as amended by the Housing Act 1980) local authorities have discretion to recover some or all of the grant paid. DOE circular 21/80 gives further advice.

Child Care

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report which national child care organisations have received Government funding under partnership grants in each of the past five years to the latest date; and if he will list the amounts granted.

Sir George Young: The information which the hon. Member asks for is not readily available in the form required. Expenditure by the inner city partnerships on projects involving child care is estimated at over £9 million for 1984-85.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what departmental studies have been carried out on the transfer of services from the Greater London council to the London boroughs in 1986; and if he will make the maximum amount of information on the transfer available as soon as possible.

Sir George Young: My officials are discussing, with as many boroughs as are prepared to do so, plans for the smooth transfer of functions from the GLC. In addition, the Department has offered to make available to all successor authorities information obtained under section 5 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has for providing financial assistance to the London boroughs to meet the extra cost of staff engaged in the detailed planning necessary between January 1985 and March 1986 to enable the smooth transfer of responsibilities from the Greater London council; and if he has considered an adjustment of grant-related expenditure assessment for this purpose.

Sir George Young: There are no such proposals. Adequate advance planning for the proposed transfer of functions should bring its own reward to the London boroughs and their ratepayers.

London Borough of Hillingdon

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why there is a reduction of £600,000 on factor E 18, interest receipts and contributions from the rate fund to special and capital funds, for the London borough of Hillingdon; and on what basis he has determined this reduction.

Mr. Waldegrave: This reduction in Hillingdon's E 18 GRE factor is almost entirely due to the increased negative control total for interest receipts between 1984-85 and 1985-86, as a result of higher interest rates. This is a factor affecting all authorities. In addition, there is a small effect resulting from the increased share of GRE for interest receipts assumed for outer London boroughs, as a result of using latest outturn expenditure information.

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why the indicator for residence for the London borough of Hillingdon is reduced from £24.8437 per unit in 1984-85 to £16.75417 per unit for 1985-86.

Mr. Waldegrave: The reduction in the grant-related expenditure (GRE) weighting on Hillingdon's total resident population from 1984-85 to 1985-86 arises from the improvements which have been made to GRE methodology for 1985-86. The inclusion of extra indicators in the formulae for recreation, road maintenance and passenger transport revenue support reduces the weighting given to the total resident population of an area for all authorities.

Fluoridation

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the water authorities which have, since the coming into force of the Water Act 1983, considered in public applications from health authorities to fluoridate the public water supply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: I am not aware that any water authority has considered an application from a health authority to fluoridate the public water supply since the Water Act 1983 came into force.

Local Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to restrict local authorities spending capital receipts incuding those from council house sales received in 1985-86 from being spent in 1985-86.

Sir George Young: I refer my right hon. Friend to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 18 December 1984 at column 164.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the effect on the public sector borrowing requirement if a local authority in receipt of proceeds from a council house sale lends the money to a clearing bank; and what the effect on the public sector borrowing requirement is if it subsequently withdraws the loan.

Sir George Young: If a local authority receives money from the private sector for the sale of a council house and deposits it with a clearing bank, that reduces the public sector borrowing requirement in the year in which the sale is made. Withdrawing and spending the money increases the pubic sector borrowing requirement in the year of spending.

Lake Vyrnwy

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums of money were paid in each of the years 1979 to 1984 in respect of water abstracted from Lake Vyrnwy; and by whom.

Mr. Macfarlane: The major abstraction from Lake Vyrnwy is on behalf of the North West water authority. In the financial period 1979-80 to 1984-85 it has paid the following abstraction charges to Severn-Trent water authority.

Financial year	Abstraction charge paid £
1979-80	223,680
1980-81	268,240
1981-82	297,600
1982-83	319,040
1983-84	334,720
1984-85	348,480

Water Pollution (North-West)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the recent pollution of the north-west water supply.

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will set up an inquiry into the recent discharge of pollutants into the north-west water supply; (2) if he will make a statement on the recent pollution of the north-west water supply.

Mr. Macfarlane: On Tuesday 8 January, pollution was detected in the river Dee. The North-West water authority, and the other three water undertakers concerned (the Welsh water authority, the Wrexham and East Denbighshire water company, and the Chester waterworks company) closed their river intakes in good time to prevent any of the polluting substances from entering the public water supply. Alternative supplies were introduced, and consumers were asked to economise in the use of water, in order to conserve those resources.

The Welsh water authority quickly identified the source of the pollution, and took immediate steps to control it. The contaminating substances were identified, and their toxicological effects were assessed without delay. Throughout the incident the lessons of earlier pollution incidents were applied, and there was good liaison between the four undertakings concerned.

I am advised that analysis of the river water shows that it is now safe for the four undertakers to reopen their intakes in the river Dee, and they have now done so. I see no need to set up an inquiry.

Housing Investment Programme Allocations

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reconcile the figures in his Department's letter to local authorities, dated 20 December 1984, regarding housing investment programme allocations 1985-86 with his statement on 19 December, Official Report, column 306, that the overspend on council's capital programme could amount to £1 billion or more.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I will answer this question shortly.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many copies of the leaflets, "After the GLC", and, "After the MCCs", have been printed; to whom they have been distributed; and what is the total cost of producing them.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: 5,000 copies of each of the leaflets have been printed. Copies have been sent to all Members of Parliament, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the London Boroughs Association, the Association of London Authorities, the press and members of the public in response to requests. The total cost of producing them was £9,600.

In response to the substantial demand for copies, from the authorities themselves and from Members of Parliament, we are printing a further 25,000 copies of "After the GLC" and 40,000 copies of "After the MCCs" at a cost of £3,400.

Water (Fluoridation) Bill

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent medical research evidence he considered before introducing the Water (Fluoridation) Bill.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 9 January 1985, c. 480]: I have been asked to reply.

The relevant medical and scientific evidence has been considered, including that placed before Lord Jauncey in the Strathclyde court case, and subsequent studies. In particular, a comprehensive review of the epidemiological evidence has recently been completed by a working party on fluoride and cancer, chaired by Professor E. G. Knox. This report has been published today and copies are available in the Vote Office. On this basis our medical and scientific advisers have been able to give authorities advice as to the safety of fluoridation.

PRIME MINISTER

Tax Concessions

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister what are the powers of and the authority for Ministers to grant extra-statutory tax concessions; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The boards of Inland Revenue and of Customs and Excise have duties laid upon them by statute, subject to the general direction of the Treasury. The Government are considering the debate on extra-statutory concessions which took place at Report stage of the Finance Bill last year and will publish a response as soon as it is ready.

Public Employees

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what was the number of persons full and part-time (a) in the Civil Service and (b) in local government in the United Kingdom in June 1979 and June 1984 and, in each case, showing the reduction of persons employed in percentage terms and numerically.

The Prime Minister: The following are the figures.

Numbers employed at mid-year

	1979	1984	Reduction Number	per cent.
Civil Service
Full time	709	609	100	14
Part time	30	21	8	28
Local government
Full time	1980	1880	100	5
Part time	1017	1004	13	1

Sources: Civil Service Quarterly Staff Return at 1 July each year. Joint Manpower Watch for local authorities, at 9 June 1979 and 16 June 1984.

Reductions and percentage changes are based on unrounded figures. The Northern Ireland Civil Service is excluded.

National Heritage Memorial Fund

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister which trustees of the national heritage memorial fund have been appointed because of their professional, or former professional interest and involvement in nature conservation, scenic conservation or the promotion of public access to, and enjoyment of, the countryside.

The Prime Minister: As I indicated in my reply to the hon. Member on 4 December 1984 at column 127, the present trustees have a wide range of experience and interest demonstrated. I am satisfied that the trustees have a sufficient knowledge of countryside matters to bring to their task.

Child Abuse

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between the Home Department and the Department of Health and Social Services concerning the prevention of abuse and interference with children in care; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Home Secretary has recently announced his intention to review the arrangements for the disclosure of information about those who seek to work with children, and there will of course be close consultation between the Departments concerned.

Africa (Famine Relief)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what progress has been made in implementing the decisions of the Dublin summit regarding grain supplies to Ethiopia and other African countries.

The Prime Minister: Since the European Council in Dublin, £103·25 million has been committed from the emergency provision of the European development fund and from the 1984 Community budget for this purpose. But until member states all announce what they intend to give, the Community cannot finally determine the size and cost of its contribution. The Government have announced that they will contribute up to 110,000 tonnes.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will estimate the amount of grain pledged to African countries since September 1984 by (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Economic community: and, of these amounts, how much has already been transported to the recipient countries.

The Prime Minister: 33,000 tonnes of grain have been committed by the United Kingdom, 18,300 tonnes of which has been delivered. 222,988 tonnes have been committed by the European community, of which 13,000 tonnes have been delivered. In all about 106,000 tonnes have been shipped during this period including deliveries from earlier commitments.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what estimates are available to her regarding the amount of grain required by African countries suffering from drought in each of the coming three years.

The Prime Minister: Estimates of this kind are not available. The Government see different forecasts of the grain requirements of drought affected African countries from a variety of sources, including the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation, but none of the forecasts yet goes beyond 1985.

Civil Contingencies Unit (Coal Industry Dispute)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Prime Minister what liaison exists between the civil contingencies unit and the national reporting centre; and whether the civil contingencies unit has been involved in the monitoring of, or any other activities related to, the miners' strike.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to my reply of 14 November 1984 to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) at column 243.

Government Boarding Allowances

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister if she will publish figures broken down by Department for the cost of Government boarding allowance schemes for public servants in 1983-84; and if she will set out the circumstances for each scheme in which allowances are paid.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 10 January 1985, c. 528]: I regret that the final two paragraphs were omitted. The complete answer is as follows:

The figures requested for 1983-84 are as follows:

	£ million
Armed Forces	76·5
Diplomatic Service	5·9
British Council	1·2
Overseas Development Administration	0·7
Ministry of Defence (Civilians)	0·5
Other Departments	0·2
Total	85·0

The total differs slightly from that given in my reply to the hon. Member on 14 December 1984 at column 606 because that reply covered only the Ministry of Defence and the Diplomatic Service.

It also excludes £1·8 million from the overseas aid programme paid in boarding school allowances to British supplemented staff employed by overseas governments and organisations.

As to the circumstances in which boarding school allowances are payable I refer the hon. Member to my reply to a similar question from my hon. Friend, the Member for Cornwall, South-East (Mr. Hicks) on 31 October 1984 at columns 974-975.

ENERGY

Coal Stocks

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the total amount of coal stocks held by (a) the National Coal Board and (b) power stations on 31 December 1984.

Mr. David Hunt: The latest published figures are for October 1984. At the end of that month the position was:

(a) stocks at colleries and opencast sites:
21·635 million tonnes
(b) stocks at power stations:
15·484 million tonnes

Miners (Redundancies)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate he has provided to the European Commission on the numbers of miners he expects to accept redundancy in 1984, 1985, 1986 and 1987, respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

NCB (Advertising and Publicity)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information is available to his Department about the amount of expenditure by the National Coal Board on advertising since 6 March 1984.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information is available to him about the estimated cost to the National Coal Board of its publicity campaign to induce striking miners to return to work.

Mr. David Hunt: None. This is a matter for the National Coal Board.

Scottish Coalfields (Investment)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the latest figures for the amount of investment in Scottish coalfields, by year, from 1978-79, with the projected figures for the coming five years.

Mr. David Hunt: Mining investment in the Scottish area of the NCB was:

Year	£m
1978-79	19
1979-80	22
1980-81	35
1981-82	38
1982-83	34
1983-84	31

Notes:
These figures are taken from the NCB annual report and accounts.
The 1983-84 figure includes deferred interest.

Projected figures for the coming five years are not available.

Atomic Energy

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether the subsidiary arrangements referred to in Articles 39 and 40 of the 1977 tripartite UK/IAEA/EURATOM safeguards agreement, Cmnd. 6730, have entered into force.

Mr. Goodlad: Yes. The subsidiary arrangements came into force in August 1978.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Nurses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the 41 student nurses who completed their training at the Royal Victoria hospital on 21 December 1984 have been offered permanent nurse posts (a) at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast and (b) elsewhere in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: None of the 41 student nurses has so far been offered a permanent nursing post at the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast. Five have been offered posts elsewhere in Northern Ireland.

Child Care

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list in the Official Report the national child care organisations in the Province which have received Government funding in each of the past five years; and if he will list the amounts granted.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows. In addition to the amounts shown, the health and social services boards provide financial assistance to national child care organisations in respect of day care and residential facilities. Details of the actual amounts paid are not, however, readily available. Departments and health and social services boards also provide financial assistance to a number of other national or regional voluntary organisations, part of whose services benefit children and their parents.

Gas Prices

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will reconsider the decision to increase the price of gas in the Greater Belfast area by 8·5 per cent. in the light of current rates of inflation and the large proportion of domestic consumers in Northern Ireland who are either senior citizens or unemployed.

Dr. Boyson: The rules governing payment of a subsidy to meet the deficit incurred by the city's gas undertaking require that a price increase is implemented by the city council at least equal to increases in gas manufacturing costs. The Government subsidise the council's gas undertaking by paying its deficits annually, in arrears. For 1983-84, the deficit amounts to some £9 million, or nearly half operating costs. While the specific increase in the price of gas in the Belfast area is a matter for the Belfast city council to decide, the 8·5 per cent. increase represents the minimum necessary to enable the Government to make a payment in respect of the gas undertaking's deficit in 1983-84.

Milk

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many litres of milk had been purchased from farmers in Northern Ireland by the Department of Agriculture, under the Government's buy out scheme by the end of 1984; and what percentage of total milk production this represents;

(2) how many farmers in Northern Ireland have yet to decide to sell their quotas to the buy-out scheme; and what percentage of total farmers who have been invited to sell their quotas this represents.

Dr. Boyson: At the end of December 1984, 165 producers were committed to the milk supplementary levy (outgoers) scheme, involving 10·75 million litres of milk — about 0·8 per cent. of the wholesale quota for 1984-85. One hundred and thirty-one farmers had yet to decide, most having been permitted to delay their decisions pending the outcome of their special case applications for extra quota allocations under the provisions of the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1984. These producers represent 23 per cent. of those who were initially invited to proceed as outgoers.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Photosynthesis Research

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future of photosynthesis research at the Welsh plant breeding research establishment.

Mr. Brooke: The Welsh plant breeding station is an institute of the Agricultural and Food Research Council which receives a grant-in-aid from the Department's science budget. The work on photosynthesis at the station forms part of the Agricultural and Food Research Service's co-ordinated programme of research in this area. I understand that the AFRC attaches high priority to that programme. The work at the WPBS relates to grassland and in particular to the effects of low temperature, a topic of some importance in the United Kingdom.

Music Teachers

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give, or estimate, either the number of peripatetic specialist teachers of music in England or the full-time equivalent number in each of the years 1983 and 1984; what changes he expects in 1985; and which are the education authorities where such provision is likely to be reduced by more than 10 per cent. between 1983 and 1985.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, a small inquiry into the provision of instrumental music in maintained primary and secondary schools in England was carried out by Her Majesty's inspectors in 1984. At that time there were the full-time equivalent of 3,244 instrumental music teachers, compared with 3,282 in 1980-81. Taking account of the change in pupil numbers, pupil-teacher ratios for instrumental music tuition had improved by some 5 per cent. over the same period. A large majority of local education authorities anticipated being able to maintain the present level of their instrumental tuition.

School Leavers

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many school leavers there were in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Dunn: There were 765,500 in England in the academic year 1982-83 and an estimated 751,000 in 1983-84.

Human Embryos

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will give a breakdown by establishment of the numbers of occasions on which human embryos have been implanted into the wombs of other animals; how long each embryo survived; and what was the purpose of the implantation;

(2) if he will list all those establishments where research is being, or has been, undertaken involving the implantation of human embryos in the wombs of other animals;

(3) if he will list all those individuals or establishments which are currently in receipt of Government funding for research into the effect of the implantation of human embryos into wombs of other animals; how much money was paid in each case; and for what precise purpose these funds were intended.

Mr. Brooke: I am not aware of any research which is being or has been undertaken involving the implantation of human embryos into the wombs of animals.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what are the estimated pupil-teacher ratios in the maintained primary and secondary schools in the local education authorities of England for the year 1984-85;

(2) what were the pupil-teacher ratios in the maintained primary and secondary schools in the local education authorities of England in the academic years 1979-80 to 1983-84.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows. Estimates of pupil-teacher ratios for 1984-85 are not yet available.

Pupil-teacher ratios in England

January of each academic year	Maintained primary schools	Maintained secondary schools
1980	22·7	16·6
1981	22·6	16·6
1982	22·5	16·6
1984	22·1	16·2

Information about pupil-teacher ratios in each local education authority for the years 1979-80 to 1982-83 is set out in DES statistical bulletins 17/80, 2/82, 13/82 and 1/84, respectively, copies of which are available in the Library. For 1983-84, I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 20 November 1984, at columns 145-47, to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

Ethnic Minority Groups (Report)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish the report of Lord

Swan's committee of inquiry on the education of children from ethnic minority groups; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: I understand that the committee hopes to deliver its report to my right hon. Friend shortly. Meanwhile he has no plans to make a statement.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police, pickets and others have been injured since 1 December during the coal mining dispute; and what is the cumulative figure since the dispute began.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the period from 1 December to 10 January inclusive, 58 police officers were injured in incidents connected with the miners' dispute. The total number of police officers injured in the period from 13 March to 10 January inclusive was 1,305. It is not possible to say how many members of the public have been injured because not all their injuries are necessarily reported to the police.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been arrested on picket lines since 1 December; and if he will list their occupations as notified to the police.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information available centrally is as follows:

Occupations given by persons arrested between 5 December and 8 January inclusive:

Occupation	Number
Miners	290
Student	1
Non-manual workers	2
Housewife	1
Unemployed	37
Not known/given	15
Total	346

Police (Pay)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers in England and Wales, by rank, are currently in receipt of earnings, including rent allowance, of more than £20,000 per annum.

Mr. Giles Shaw: This information is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. But if overtime is excluded, only superintendents and above normally earn more than £20,000 a year.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals in respect of the salaries of police officers of the rank of constable.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The determination of police pay is a matter for the Police Negotiating Board, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. The Police (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1984 gave effect to the increases in police pay with effect from 1 September 1984, which were negotiated by the board last year.

Prison Rules

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes were made in the prison rules during 1984; and if he has any current proposals for further changes.

Mr. Mellor: No changes were made to the prison rules during 1984. We do not at present have any immediate plans to change them.

Asbestos

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what submission he has received from the Society for the Prevention of Asbestosis and Industrial Diseases calling for a central unit to deal with asbestos contamination caused by fire; and what is his response.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such submission from the society.

Prevention of Terrorism

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why persons arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act over the Christmas holiday period in England and Wales have been transferred to Liverpool.

Mr. Brittan: Three people arrested in other parts of the country were taken to Liverpool for questioning in connection with an investigation being conducted by the Merseyside police.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been detained under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act over the Christmas holiday period to the latest date in England and Wales; how many persons have been charged; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Between 24 December 1984 and 10 January 1985, 19 people were detained under the prevention of terrorism legislation in England and Wales. By 10 January, seven had been charged with criminal offences. Of these two were convicted and five were remanded in custody.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many persons have been arrested on Merseyside under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act to the latest available date; how many were subsequently (a) charged and (b) convicted; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many persons have been detained in England and Wales under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act to the most recent available date; and how many were (a) charged and (b) convicted.

Mr. Brittan: The available information on detentions under the Prevention of Terrorism Acts relates to the period up to 30 September 1984 and is published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin 25/84, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Of the 458 subsequently charged throughout Great Britain, 344 had been found guilty; I will provide figures for England and Wales and for Merseyside as soon as possible.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the number of persons detained over the Christmas holiday period to date under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisons) Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I have received a number of telephone calls and letters from hon. Members and members of the public concerning recent detentions under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act.

Mr. James Magis

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the appropriate chief constable on the circumstances in which James Magis was arrested on 28 November on his arrival at Dover and was detained until he was placed on a plane to Paris on 5 December; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: Mr. James Magis arrived at Dover on 28 November 1984 and was detained by an immigration officer for further examination under the Immigration Act 1971. Later that day he was arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and taken to London for questioning by the police. I subsequently authorised extensions of Mr. Magis' detention of four days and then of a further day. On 5 December he was refused leave to enter the United Kingdom on my personal direction that his exclusion would be conducive to the public good. He was removed to France on the same day.

Weekend Detention

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether his Department has made any study of the weekend detention system which operates in Australia; whether he has any plans to make this type of punishment available to magistrates; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he will introduce a pilot scheme of weekend detention; what facilities he has available to him for the operation of such a scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In our consideration of intermittent custody we have taken account of experience in several overseas countries, but have made no study specifically of the systems which I understand exist in two Australian states. My right hon. and learned Friend is giving careful consideration to the responses he has received to the Green Paper published last year.

Criminal Sentencing System

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any proposals for the reform of the criminal sentencing system in the light of the report of the Advisory Council on the Penal System "Sentences of Imprisonment: a review of maximum penalties".

Mr. Mellor: No.

National Reporting Centre

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what he estimates to be the running costs of the national reporting centre in 1984; and who is responsible for the payment of its costs.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the agreement between the national reporting centre and individual chief constables.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There is no such agreement.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what level of manpower individual chief constables are committed to providing on request for mutual aid through the national reporting centre.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The system of providing mutual aid through the national reporting centre, and the number of officers who can be provided in response to a request for aid is an operational decision for individual chief officers and there is no set level of manpower which they are committed to providing.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what basis he receives reports from the national reporting centre; and whether these reports are given daily.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Secretary receives daily reports through the national reporting centre from chief officers of police in England and Wales about their operations in relation to events arising from the miners' dispute.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were held at Winson Green prison in Birmingham on 31 December 1984; how many of those prisoners were unconvicted; and how many unconvicted prisoners had been provisionally put in category A.

Mr. Mellor: The population of Birmingham prison on 31 December 1984 was 870 including 333 unconvicted prisoners, of whom five were provisionally placed in category A.

Circular Instruction 10/1976

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many amendments to circular instruction 10/1976 were issued during 1984.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Prisoners (Information Booklet)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the information booklet given to each prisoner on reception was last reprinted; and whether he will put a copy in the Library.

Mr. Mellor: The information booklets issued on reception to male and female prisoners respectively have not been reprinted since their introduction in April 1983, but revised versions of both are now in the course of preparation. I have arranged for copies of the booklets to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Mohammed Siddique

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors have been approved for Mr. Mohammed Siddique who is an unconvicted prisoner on remand at Winson Green prison in Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: Eleven.

Mr. Abdul Raja

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors have been approved for Mr. Abdul Raja who is an unconvicted prisoner on remand at Winson Green prison in Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: Nine.

Mr. Riaz

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visitors have been approved for Mr. Riaz who is an unconvicted prisoner on remand at Winson Green prison in Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: Twelve.

Unconvicted Prisoners

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents involving unconvicted prisoners who had been provisionally put in category A were reported to his Department in November.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Winson Green Prison (Prisoners' Letters)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, 20 December 1984, Official Report, column 291, when his noble Friend will write to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill.

Mr. Mellor: Inquiries are being made into the matters raised by the hon. Member and my noble Friend will write to him as soon as these have been completed.

Thames Valley Police

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what request he has received for an increase in the establishment of the Thames Valley police force; and if he will take into account all representations he receives about the establishment of that force before reaching a decision on that request.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Thames Valley police authority has applied for increases of 174 police posts in the authorised establishment of the force, including seven which are currently held on a supernumerary basis. My right hon. and learned Friend is considering the applications in the light of advice from Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary, and he will take account of all the representations he has received.

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Thames Valley police force police as to (a) the cost of the Thames Valley police per 1,000 of population and (b) the numbers of police officers per 1,000 of population; and if he will compare the figures with the national average.

Mr. Giles Shaw: "Police Statistics 1983-84 Actuals", published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, show that the net expenditure of Thames Valley police per 1,000 population was £35,296 in the financial year 1983-84, compared with the average of £50,435 for all forces in England and Wales and £40,127 in English non-metropolitan counties. There are 1·78 police officers per 1,000 population in Thames Valley, compared with the average of 2·41 for all forces in England and Wales.

Drugs Offences

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases criminal proceedings have been brought against traffickers and smugglers of drugs in the United Kingdom in each year since 1979.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is given in the following table. Figures for 1984 are not yet available.

Persons proceeded against for trafficking in controlled drugs by type of offence in United Kingdom*

Offence	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

* As the person may be proceeded against for more than one offence rows cannot be added together to produce totals.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Legal Aid

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General whether he has any proposals for extending the availability of legal aid to tribunals: and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Advice and assistance under the green form scheme is available, subject to means, to those involved in tribunal proceedings. This does not extend to representation. Legal aid or assistance by way of representation is available for proceedings before the Lands Tribunal, the Commons Commissioners, the Employment Appeal Tribunal and mental health review tribunals. There are no present plans to extend these to other tribunals.

Criminal Legal Aid

57. Mr. Dubs asked the Attorney-General what arrangements he has made to monitor the effects of the Legal Aid Act 1982 on the grant of criminal legal aid.

The Solicitor-General: The Lord Chancellor is concerned that he should receive accurate and prompt statistical returns from the magistrates courts on the grant and refusal of legal aid, and a more precise and simpler form of return has been introduced. The Law Society is collecting statistics on applications made to the criminal legal aid committees, including applications for recourse after refusal of legal aid by magistrates' courts.

Residential Flats (Leasehold Reform)

58. Mr. John Fraser asked the Attorney-General if the Lord Chancellor will ask the Law Commission to carry out an inquiry into methods of achieving leasehold reform for residential flats.

The Solicitor-General: The Lord Chancellor has under consideration the Law Commission's report No. 127 on positive and restrictive covenants, and the Building Societies' Association proposals in its report "Leaseholds-Time for a Change?", both of which involve aspects concerning the ownership of flats. The public will be given an opportunity to comment upon the provisional conclusions on these matters before any major reform is proposed. The conclusions of the committee on the management of blocks of flats under the chairmanship of Mr. E. G. Nugee QC will also have to be taken into account. In the circumstances the separate reference to the Law Commission suggested by the hon. Member would not be desirable.

Official Referee (Waiting List)

59. Mr. Spearing asked the Attorney-General if he will make a statement concerning the current waiting list for cases awaiting hearing by the official referee.

The Solicitor-General: For some years the number of cases awaiting hearing by the official referees had been steadily increasing; but that trend has now been reversed. The number of cases outstanding at the end of November 1984 was 1,430, 108 fewer than at the beginning of the year. The number of official referees in London has recently been increased from four to six, and further improvement may be expected.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate his Department makes of the correlation between changes in the international competitiveness of United Kingdom manufacturing industry and changes in the balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Butcher: The international competitiveness of United Kingdom manufacturing industry reflects a wide range of factors, including both cost/price competitiveness, and "non-price" factors — design, product reliability, marketing effort, delivery performance, etc. Econometric analysis can produce estimates of the effects of changes in measured cost or price competitiveness on the volumes of United Kingdom manufactured exports and imports, but such estimates are subject to wide margins of error, and the Department has not made any of its own. Changes in the balance in value terms will be affected both by changes in volumes and by changes in export and import prices.

European Space Agency

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the United Kingdom's contribution to the European Space Agency in 1984; what is the estimated contribution for the years 1985 to 1990; and if the United Kingdom estimate provides for co-operation and collaboration with the United States of America in the building of a space platform.

Mr. Butcher: The United Kingdom contribution to the European Space Agency (ESA) in 1984 was as follows:

	£ million
Department of Trade and Industry	58·5
Science and Engineering Research Council	10·7
Meteorological Office	5·7
TOTAL	74·9

The level of future contributions to ESA and whether definition studies should commence on a possible space platform will be matters for discussion between the Ministers of the ESA member states later this month.

Securities

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the progress being made in changing certain aspects of the United Kingdom securities industry and in the deregulation of certain activities in the United Kingdom stock exchanges.

Mr. Fletcher: I consider that the stock exchange is tackling the process of reform thoroughly and as rapidly as the significance of the changes admits. For the rest, I shall very shortly be laying a White Paper before the House.

Erasers (Swallowing Accidents)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent information he has obtained about the numbers of children receiving medical attention following swallowing accidents; and if he will publish a table showing the numbers of incidents related to categories of items swallowed, including erasers.

Mr. Fletcher: The latest figures for all age groups reported by the 20 hospitals participating in my Department's home accident surveillance system are given below. With the exception of food items almost all of these relate to children.

Food Imitations (Safety) Regulations 1985

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many representations he has received about the draft Food Imitations (Safety) Regulations 1985; and what number of this total gave general support to the proposals.

Mr. Fletcher: Fifty two representations have been received about the draft Food Imitations (Safety) Regulations 1985, of which 39 gave general support to the proposals.

Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982

Mr. Brinton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if any further orders are to be made under section 12(4) of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes. On 4 January I made an order that the provisions of section 13 of this Act shall not apply to the services rendered by an arbitrator in his capacity as such. It has been laid before the House today, and will come into operation on 1 March.

The order is similar to two other orders; the Supply of Services (Exclusion of Implied Terms) Order 1982, SI 1982/1771 and the Supply of Services (Exclusion of Implied Terms) Order 1983, SI 1983/902 which, respectively, disapply section 13 from the services rendered by company directors to their companies and the services rendered to a building society by a director of the society or to those rendered to an industrial or provident society by a member of its committee of management or other directing body.

The obligations (if any) which arbitrators owe to the parties to an arbitration will, in cases where the subject is not dealt with in their contract or otherwise provided for, accordingly be governed by the Common Law and not section 13 of the 1982 Act.

WALES

Secondary Quota Distribution Tribunals

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will enumerate the representations he has received on the results of the deliberations of secondary quota distribution tribunals.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Twelve.

Housing Stock

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the proportion of the Welsh housing stock which was either demolished or ceased to be used for occupation in the last 12 months for which statistics are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: During the year ending 30 September 1984, 0·04 per cent. of the dwelling stock was either demolished or closed due to unfitness.

House Building

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he plans to take to help Welsh local authorities which have no more land available for building new houses.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In September 1984 the Welsh Office issued circular 47/84 "Land for Housing in Wales" advising local authorities on their responsibility to ensure that there is an adequate supply of land available for housing. The circular advised that where the supply is found to be inadequate to meet the structure plan provision for housing, authorities should consider what steps to take including expediting planning applications and allocating additional land through the preparation and adoption of local plans. The Land Authority for Wales with its powers to acquire and dispose of land for development can also play a significant role in making more housing land available.

Nursery Schools

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many nursery schools pupils there were in Wales in each of the years 1979 to 1984; and how many nursery school places were available in each of those years.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows:

Numbers of pupils attending maintained nursery schools in Wales

	Full-time	Part-time
1978-79	1,808	2,786
1979-80	1,702	2,624
1980-81	1,604	2,591
1981-82	1,466	2,654
1982-83	1,468	2,856
1983-84	1,463	2,962

These figures do not include pupils attending nursery classes in primary schools. Information as to the number of nursery school places is not available centrally.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any proposals for the future development of pre-school and nursery education in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The Welsh Office will continue to provide an element of financial support to organisations which cater for pre-school children. Provision for under-fives by local education authorities in Wales is at a high level, some 85 per cent. of 3 and 4 year-olds being catered for and Government policy assumes that provision will continue at this level. Provision in any particular area, however, is for individual local education authorities to determine in the light of all the relevant circumstances.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the pupil-teacher ratios in the maintained primary and secondary schools in the local education authorities of Wales in the academic years 1979-80 to 1983-84.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows:

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the estimated pupil-teacher ratios in the maintained primary and secondary schools in the local education authorities of Wales for the year 1984-85.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: Estimated pupil-teacher ratios for 1984-85 are not available.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the expenditure by each of the local education authorities in Wales in primary and secondary schools, the expenditure to be expressed as cost per pupil, in cost and real terms, since 1979-80.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows:

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the capital expenditure by each of the Welsh county councils, for each of the last five years, since 1979, shown separately under the following heads: education, social services, highways and transportation, fire services, environment and economic development.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of spending by (a) county councils and (b) district councils, has been met by rate support grant over the last 10 financial years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Rate support grant is composed of block grant and domestic rate relief grant. Block grant is payable to individual authorities in support of their total expenditure. Domestic rate relief grant is payable to district councils, as rating authorities, in support of the total rate levied, which includes the appropriate county precept. A meaningful division of the total rate support grant is not, therefore, possible except as in the following table. Comparisons prior to the introduction of block grant in 1981-82 are not separately available for county and district councils.

Block grant as percentage total expenditure

	County councils	District councils	Domestic rate relief as percentage total expenditure
1981-82	61·2	60·7	4·2

*Domestic relief was reduced from 36p to 18½p in the £ in 1982-83.

Rates

Mr. Hooson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the likely change in rate poundages at the rating authority level in 1985-86.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The actual level of rate poundages in 1985-86 will depend on the budget decisions of individual authorities. However, if each authority were to spend precisely at the expenditure target I have set for it in 1985-86, and were to apply, subject to reported constraints, the same amount from their reserves to reduce the rate burden as in the present financial year, the percentage change in average general rate poundages would be as set out in the following table. The estimates reflect the combined poundages of county, district and community councils.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total amount of benefit claimed by, and in respect of, unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to reply on my behalf to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk

Mr. Hicks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be able to confirm the amount of secondary milk quota allocations to individual milk producers and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The work of the local panels in England and Wales was completed by the end of December apart from a very few cases where there are special problems. The tribunal has around 4,500 exceptional hardship and appeal hearings to be heard during January. By 21 January 2,710 will have been heard leaving 1,790 to be dealt with. Most of the tribunal's work will be completed by the end of January or early February. When this work is complete we shall be able to assess the total amount of secondary quota awarded and calculate any scaling down that may be necessary in the case of development awards.

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate how many litres of milk production will be available for redistribution as secondary quota if larger producers, who originally applied for the outgoers scheme, are now allowed to participate.

Mr. Jopling: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement outlining the progress made by the United Kingdom and other members of the Common Market in implementing and applying the agreement on milk quotas.

Mr. Jopling: In the United Kingdom allocation of quota to special cases is continuing, with local panels having completed their work by the end of December apart from a very few cases where there are special problems. Most of the tribunal's work will be completed by the end of January or early February.

The Agriculture Commissioner told the Council on 11 December that all member states had made individual quotas known to their producers, with the exception of Luxembourg, where there are administrative difficulties, and Italy and Greece, where no levy is liable until after the end of the marketing year. The extent to which special cases and other administrative details had been completed varied considerably, but all member states still had some problems to resolve.

As my hon. Friend the Minister of State explained in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) on 17 December, at column 37, it became clear from the Council discussion that there were differences in the interpretation of the rules and uncertainty about the amount of levy due. While maintaining our full commitment to the supplementary levy arrangements, we therefore suspended action for the time being, as did certain other member states. In any event only Germany collected levy by the due date in mid-December.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government to seek measures to enable milk quotas to be transferred from one producer to another and for payments to be made for such transfers.

Mr. Jopling: In the Government's view the present Community rules regarding transfer of quota are too inflexible. I have recently issued a discussion document (copies are available in the Library of the House) which considers the scope for quota transfers under the present regulations and the options for changes to the regulations. One of these options is that quotas should be freely marketable. I have sought the views of interested organisations in the farming industry and professional bodies on this document and I shall decide on our objectives in Brussels in the light of the comments I receive.

EC (Food and Wine Exports)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the export of food and wine by the European Economic Community to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and eastern Europe, respectively, in that part of 1984 for which figures are available; and what were the comparable totals for the same part of each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Jopling: The latest available details of the European Community's trade relate to the period January to March 1984. The following table shows the value of exports of the main items of food and wine to the Soviet Union and eastern Europe (including the Soviet Union) in the January to March period for each year since 1978. Corresponding information for earlier years is not readily available.

EC Expenditure

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total amount spent by the Common Market on agriculture in 1984; what were the totals in each of the previous 10 years; and what estimate has been made of expenditure in 1985.

Mr. Jopling: The following table sets out the total expenditure by the Community on the common agricultural policy from 1975 to 1984. The 1985 budget has not yet been adopted.

Wheat Prices

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North, Official Report, 14 December 1984, column 623, if he will show the average ex-farm price of wheat in the United Kingdom for 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984 at constant prices showing 1979 price as 100.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

EC Grain Stocks

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the level of grain stocks held by the European Economic Community under the intervention policies of the common agricultural policy on 1 January 1985; and what has been the (a) nominal and (b) percentage increase in these stocks since 1 September 1984.

Mr. MacGregor: Statistics on intervention stock levels are not available for the particular dates requested.

The total amount of grain held in intervention on 4 January 1985 was 11·9 million tonnes. This represents an increase of 6·9 million tonnes, or 139 per cent., since 31 August, and of 3·1 million tonnes, or 35 per cent., over a complete year.

EC Surplus Butter

Mr. Torney asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at what price he has authorised European Economic Community surplus butter to be sold in the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: The Butter (EEC Special Sale) Regulations 1984 (SI 1984 No. 1765) fix a maximum retail selling price of 42p per 250 gramme pack for butter sold from United Kingdom intervention stocks under EEC Commission Regulation No. 2956/84. In fixing the maximum price at this level, we were concerned to enable small retail outlets and those in remote areas to sell this butter without loss. We are confident, however, that most consumers will be able to buy this butter at prices significantly lower than the maximum and expect prices of between 33 and 36p to be common in supermarkets.

Intervention Stocks (Information)

Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make arrangements for the regular provision of information on the levels of intervention stocks of products covered by the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the present levels of surplus and intervention stores of food and wine in the European Economic Community in public and private storage, respectively; and what were the comparable totals around the same date in each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Jopling: I have today deposited in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament a note giving the most recent figures available on the level of stocks of agricultural products held in public intervention and private storage in the United Kingdom and the European Community as a whole. The note gives information on stock levels expressed both in terms of quantity and in days supply. I will deposit each month the most recent revised figures available.

I will publish the information for earlier years as soon as possible.

THE ARTS

National Theatre (Funding)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what supplementary level of funding Her Majesty's Government intend to allocate to the National Theatre in 1985.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is for the Arts Council and not for my right hon. and noble Friend to determine the level of funding of individual companies.

CIVIL SERVICE

Shortlisting Criteria

Mr. Freeson asked the Minister for the Civil Service (1) if any political criteria are used in formulating shortlists of applicants for Civil Service posts;

(2) of what organisations membership is considered to make applicants applying for Civil Service posts unsuitable for shortlisting and appointment;

(3) if any kind of political blacklist is used in formulating shortlists of applicants for Civil Service posts.

Mr. Hayhoe: I can assure the right hon. Member that political affiliation plays no part in the selection of candidates for Civil Service posts. No blacklist or political criteria are used in shortlisting applicants and membership of no organisation would exclude an applicant from consideration.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Employment what provisions are made by the Manpower Services Commission to insure equipment used in community programme schemes; what is the minimum sum insured against; and what was the capital cost of Manower Services Commission equipment lost, stolen or broken in the United Kingdom in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Insurance of equipment used on community programme projects is the responsibility of the sponsor or agent mounting the project and not the Manpower Services Commission. The cost can be met from the refund of project operating costs. Sponsors or agents contract with the commission that, in the event of the loss, theft or breakage of any equipment purchased with monies made available under the community programme, they will reimburse its market value. Information is not collated nationally about such reimbursements.

Trainees (Business Ventures)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to enable the Manpower Services Commission to offer bank guarantees to former trainees intent on starting up in business.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have no plans to do so. The Government's loan guarantee scheme provides access to loan finance for those, including former trainees, who wish to set up or expand a small business and who may have difficulty in securing financial backing under conventional terms.

Wages

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the correlation over the past decade between the wages of women relative to those of men and the number of women in employment relative to the number of men in employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: Average weekly earnings of all full-time female employees increased from 57·2 per cent. of all full time male earnings in 1974 to 65·5 per cent. in 1984 according to the new earnings survey. In the period from June 1974 to June 1984 the ratio of full-time female employees to male employees increased from 41·2 per cent. to 42·4 per cent.

In addition a large number of women have joined the labour force on a part-time basis but it is difficult to provide comparable earnings data.

The positive correlation between full-time female relative earnings and employment can be attributed to the combined effects of equal pay legislation and the relative buoyancy of those sectors of the labour market which employ most female labour.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment which three regions of the United Kingdom have the highest levels of unemployment; and which three regions have the lowest wage rates.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment rates by region are included in the monthly press notice of unemployment and vacancy figures, copies of which are available in the Library. Figures of the average gross weekly earnings of full-time adult employees working a full week in each of the regions of the United Kingdom in April 1983 are given in tables 8.7 and 8.8 of "Regional Trends 1984", a copy of which is also available in the Library.

Visual Display Units

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will introduce legislation to provide that pregnant women employed to use visual display units be given alternative work should such a request be made;

(2) if he will introduce legislation limiting the hours per shift a person is exposed to visual display units to a maximum of four.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have no plans to introduce such legislation.

Women (Earnings)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any statistical evidence relating the employment prospects of women in the United Kingdom to their levels of earnings relative to men.

Mr. Alan Clark: The relationship between earnings of women relative to men and their employment prospects is difficult to evaluate as allowance must be made for such factors as the structure of employment demand, available labour supply, and the effects of legislation such as the Equal Pay and Sex Discrimination Acts.

A recent analysis of the topic which tried to take these factors into account suggested that a 1 per cent. increase in female earnings relative to male earnings would reduce the demand for relative female employment by between 3·1 per cent. and 3·8 per cent. ("The Effect of Britain's Anti-Discriminatory Legislation on Relative Pay and Employment" by A. Zabalza and Z. Tzannatos. Centre for Labour Economics, Discussion Paper No. 155, May 1983, a copy of which is available in the Library).

Labour Statistics

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the current unemployed have never held a job (a) in the London borough of Newham and (b) in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on claimants who have been unemployed since leaving full-time education, by jobcentre area and for the United Kingdom, is available in the Library.

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will amend the formula whereby the figures for employed and unemployed are calculated monthly, by including in the numerator and the denominator those categorised as self-employed.

Mr. Alan Clark: I do not propose to change the formula as suggested. Since people who have been self-employed in the tax year relevant to a claim are not entitled to unemployment benefits, the denominator would have a wider coverage than the numerator in using the figures of claimant unemployed for calculating unemployment rates. Moreover, figures on the self-employed are only infrequently available at local level from population censuses.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the average wage of (a) 16 to 17-year-old women and men, (b) 18 to 20-year-old women and men, (c) over 21-year-old women and men in 1979 and in 1984; what was the percentage rise over the period; what was the unemployment figure for each group in 1979 and 1984; and what was the percentage rise over the period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information from the new earnings survey in April each year is as follows:

Average gross weekly earnings (£) of full-time employees in Great Britain whose pay was unaffected by absence

Age	Males			Females
	1979	1984	per cent. increase	1979	1984	per cent. increase
Under 18	40·3	63·3	57·1	36·6	58·6	60·1
18-20	61·9	101·0	63·2	48·7	82·3	69·0
21 & over	101·4	181·6	79·1	65·3	121·2	85·6

The information on unemployment by sex for the under 18, 18 to 19 and 20 or over age groups is available in the Library. However, direct comparison of the figures for 1979 and 1984 in the form of a percentage increase is not possible because of the change in the basis of the unemployment count in October 1982.

Wages and Labour Costs

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the yearly increase in (a) real wages and (b) real labour costs per employee in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available in (i) each member state of the EEC and (ii) the United States of America.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The available information relates to manufacturing industry. Yearly increases in real hourly earnings in manufacturing are contained in table 9.2 of 'OECD Economic Outlook: Historical Statistics 1960-82' (Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, Paris 1984), a copy of which is in the Library. The latest information on total hourly labour costs is shown in the following table:

Apprenticeship Training Schemes

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration he has given to ways of providing greater encouragement to industry to expand apprenticeship training schemes for young people with particular regard to high technology jobs; whether he has any proposals to put to Parliament on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Wages Councils

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Employment how much wages councils cost to administer in 1982, 1983 and 1984; and if he will make an estimate of the cost in 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The cost of administering wages councils, including the cost of the wages inspectorate, for each of the past three years is as follows:

	£ million
1981-82	4·067
1982-83	3·839
1983-84	4·029

The estimated cost for the current financial year is around £4·25 million.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Employment how much the Licensed Residential Establishment and Licensed Restaurant Wages Council cost to administer in 1982, 1983 and 1984; and if he will make an estimate of the cost in 1985.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on the administration costs of individual wages councils is not available.

Youth Training

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people entered mode A youth training places in 1983-84; and, of these, how many and what proportion left the scheme early (a) to enter full-time employment, (b) to change to another youth training scheme, (c) to go into full or part-time education and (d) to become registered as unemployed; and if he will provide a regional breakdown of these figures for (i) East Anglia and (ii) Cambridgeshire.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Between 1 April 1983 and 31 March 1984, there were 244,725 entrants to mode A youth training schemes. The comparable figures for East Anglia and Cambridgeshire are 7,804 and 2,094 respectively. Information on how many entrants had left the scheme early and what their subsequent destinations were is not available.

A sample survey of leavers between 1 April and 31 July last year in nine areas of the country, indicated that 56 per cent. were in full-time work (and a further 2 per cent. were in part-time work), 4 per cent. were on another youth training scheme, 2 per cent. were in full-time education or training and 34 per cent. were unemployed at the time of the survey (or these, 7 per cent. were intending to go into full-time education or training). The majority (64 per cent.) of leavers covered by this survey had left the scheme early.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the amount paid under mode A youth training schemes for vacated places in 1984-85; how much this amount was in 1983-84; and what is the percentage difference between the two years;

(2) whether he has any plans to review the cut in the amount payable to operators of mode A youth training schemes as vacated places allowances made for 1984-85; and when he will announce the figures for 1985-86;

(3) what estimates were made by his Department of the effects upon operators of mode A youth training schemes of the cut in the sum paid as vacated places allowance;

(4) what representations he has received concerning the reduction in the amount paid to operators of mode A youth training schemes for vacated places.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The compensation made available for vacated places in 1983-84 was a discretionary payment subject to a maximum claim of £12 per week per place. Any compensation offered was on the basis of managing agent's demonstrable committed expenditure in respect of a vacated place. In many cases, the determination of the level of claim involved managing agents in time consuming and complex accounting procedures.

In order to simplify the arrangements, it was decided that the compensation made available for vacated places in 1984-85 should be at a flat rate of £8·50 per week per place, subject to a declaration from an agent that inescapable costs exist in respect of a vacated place. In determining this level of compensation due regard was given to average national figures.

The new approach has been generally welcomed by participants in the youth training scheme and to date I have received very few representations commenting adversely on the new arrangements.

I have no plans to review the level of compensation for the 1985-86 year of the youth training scheme.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the estimated annual cost of the youth training scheme; and what proportion of this is fixed overhead cost unaffected by duration of training.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people left youth training schemes before the completion of their first year training in (a) the first six months of 1984 and (b) the second six months of 1984.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Skillcentres (Instructors)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many skilled instructors have been made redundant from skillcentres since 3 May 1979; how many are currently expected to be made redundant; what savings he expects will be achieved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission holds no central record of compulsory redundancies amongst skillcentre instructors but as far as is known there have been no compulsory redundancies since 3 May 1979. In 1984, 154 instructors left skillcentres under the pre-redundancy arrangements of the model redundancy agreement. Of these 73 volunteered for retirement and a further 81 were required to retire at age 64.

The skillcentre training agency's proposals for the future development of the skillcentre network are designed to end the need for a subvention from the taxpayer forecast at £12 million for 1985-86. The Manpower Services Commission first considered these proposals on 13 December and will consider them again at its meeting on 24 January.

Some 1,050 staff would be affected by the proposals. but, in consultation with the trade unions concerned, STA management intend to effect the reduction with as little hardship as possible. Compulsory redundancy would only be considered after all other measures (redeployment, voluntary early retirement and compulsory retirement at aged 60 and over) had been exhausted. It is expected to be necessary for only a minority of staff.

Abbeystead Pumping Station

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to receive the report of the inspectors following the explosion at the Abbeystead pumping station.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The chairman of the Health and Safety Commission has advised me that the commission expects to consider very soon the report, which it requested from the Health and Safety Executive, and we await its advice.

Unemployed Persons

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of unemployed persons have been out of work for a year or more and are aged (a) under 25 years, (b) over 25 years, (c) 25 to 44 years and (d) over 45 years; of the latter sub-groups, what percentage are: (i) male and (ii) female; of the latter sub-groups, what percentage are (x) married, (y) single, widowed, separated or divorced; of the latter sub-groupings, what percentage (1) have dependent children of 0 to 15 years and (2) do not have dependent children of 0 to 15 years; of all sub-groupings, what percentages are (aa) unskilled or semi-skilled manual workers, (bb) are not unskilled or semi-skilled manual workers; and of all sub-groups, what percentage have (A) an employed spouse, (B) an unemployed spouse and (C) an economically inactive spouse.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 463-4]: The latest information, from provisional results of the 1983 labour force survey, is available from the following table. Information on the economic activity of the spouses of unemployed people is not available in the form requested.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Namibia

Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of (a) the specific English language training assistance provided by the British Council to Namibians inside the territory in the last five financial years and (b) the estimated number of Namibians who have benefited from this training.

Mr. Raison: Our programme of assistance for Namibians resident within the territory has been administered not by the British Council but by the British embassy in Pretoria. It began in 1983-84, when one English language training award was made. Three further awards have been made this year.

Ethiopia

63. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about aid to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: In response to the worsening famine our assistance has been concentrated on emergency relief. The cost of our help for Ethiopia over the two-year period ending last October was £15·5 million. Of this £7·8 million was contributed through the European Community. Since then we have committed about £14 million which will benefit directly those suffering from the drought in Ethiopia. Of this £3·7 million is going through the Community.

Philippines

67. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the amount of aid given by Her Majesty's Government to the Philippines in each of the past five years.

Mr. Raison: The total over the past five years, including CDC investments, was £12,133,000. Following are the figures for each year. The total gross disbursements of United Kingdom bilateral aid to the Philippines including CDC investments in each of the calendar years 1979 to 1983 were:

Year	£000's
1979	764
1980	3161
1981	3323
1982	1171
1983	3714

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

United Nations Institute for Namibia

69. Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Nations Institute for Namibia is recognised by the Government as a legal agency of the United Nations.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Nations Institute for Namibia was established by the United Nations Council for Namibia with the agreement of the United Nations General Assembly. Although we do not recognise the council's claim to be the administering authority of Namibia we accept that in other respects it is a subsidiary organ of the United Nations General Assembly. We regard its establishment of UNIN as proper. We have supported UNIN's work as benefiting a future independent Namibia.

Post Closures

Mr. Bowen Wells asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what will be the total savings achieved in the financial year 1985-86 and 1986-87 of the closure of posts announced on 18 December 1984.

Mr. Renton: Estimated savings are at least £600,000 in 1985-86 and at least £1·1 million in 1986-87 compared with what costs would otherwise have been in those years. The lower figure for 1985-86 is due to end of service payments to locally-engaged staff, expenditure on termination of leases and other winding-up costs.

Itinerants (Ireland)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Republic of Ireland regarding the level of provision of facilities for itinerants.

Mr. Renton: None.

Namibia

Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether Namibia can achieve internationally recognised independence only on the basis of United Nations Security Council resolution 435;

(2) whether all the terms of United Nations Security Council resolution 435 remain relevant to Namibia; and whether this resolution will be redrafted to take into account recent developments in South Africa.

Mr. Rifkind: We remain committed to United Nations Security Council Resolution 435, which is the internationally agreed basis for a Namibia settlement. It continues to command the support of all the parties concerned, including South Africa. It would be for all these parties to consider, and agree on, any changes.

NATIONAL FINANCE

CAP Budget

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ask the European Economic Community Council of Finance Ministers to consider proposed common agricultural policy expenditure in the light of the financial guidelines on budget discipline and to make appropriate recommendations to the Council of Foreign Ministers before the common agricultural policy budget is finally approved.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Council's recent conclusions on budget discipline provide that the Council of Finance Ministers will each year at the beginning of the budgetary procedure set a maximum level of expenditure (known as the reference framework) for the following financial year. This will include provision for CAP expenditure consistent with the financial guideline (ie. that the growth rate of market support expenditure will be less than the rate of growth in the own resources base).

The Commission has undertaken to draw up its proposals for agricultural prices in the light of the financial guideline. These proposals will be discussed in the Agriculture Council in the normal way. But a final decision may be referred to a special joint Council of Finance and Agriculture Ministers, if in the Commission's opinion the Council of Agriculture Ministers seems likely to take decisions whose cost would exceed that of the original proposals of the Commission. Decisions on budgetary provision will continue to be taken by the Budget Council.

Civil Service (Bonuses)

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the experimental scheme for bonuses related to performance in the Civil Service is in addition to incremental scales; and if he intends that any new system should replace incremental scales.

Mr. Hayhoe: The experimental scheme for bonuses related to performance in the Civil Service, which I announced on 5 December 1984 at columns 192-193, is intended to provide an additional incentive to good performance. If a bonus is paid, it will be a lump sum addition to salary. The experimental scheme will have no effect upon the present system of incremental scales, where these are paid: of the grades covered by the scheme grades 3 and 4 do not receive annual increments and the majority of staff below these levels are paid the scale maxima. Practical experience of performance-related pay is needed before any long-term decisions about it can be made.

Exchange Rate

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the exchange rate between the pound sterling and the deutschmark which would correspond to the purchasing power parity, as defined by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development; and how much it differs from the current market rate.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government do not make such calculations. Estimates prepared for the OECD are contained in its December 1984 Working Paper No. 17 (Real Gross Product in OECD Countries and Associated Purchasing Power Parities), copies of which are available through the House of Commons Library.

Inflation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate for the rate of inflation for 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Rees: For the first eight months of financial year 1984-85, the average rate of retail price inflation has been 4·9 per cent. I expect the figure for the financial year as a whole to be close to this.

£1 Notes and Coins

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of (a) £1 notes and (b) £1 coins currently in circulation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Approximately 601 million £1 notes and 203 million £1 coins.

European Community (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total net sum contributed to the Common Market in 1984; and what were the comparable totals in each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 24 October at column 605 concerning the United Kingdom's contributions for the years before 1984. Comparable figures for 1984 will not be available until the December financial returns are finalised.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the increase in the gross contributions to the Common Market which the United Kingdom will be required to make in the event of the resources of that body being increased along the lines proposed by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Heroin

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the kilogram quantities of heroin which have been seized by Customs and Excise officers in each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Council House Sales

Mr. Higgins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will compare the figures for public expenditure and the public sector borrowing requirement in each year since the policy of council house sales was introduced, with figures showing what public expenditure and the public sector borrowing requirement would have been from such sales and other local authority capital receipts if the proceeds had been spent in the year in which they were received.

Mr. Lawson: Detailed information is not available about the amount of capital receipts unspent by local authorities in individual years. It is therefore not possible to make this comparison.

£1 Note

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any views on the possibility of some clearing banks producing their own £1 notes.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 486]: As I said in my reply on 26 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) at column 377 there are no plans to alter the provisions relating to private bank note issue.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Track Servicing)

5. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much is spent on track servicing by British Rail; and what proportion of the network is serviced each year.

Mr. David Mitchell: In 1983, British Rail spent £492 million on track maintenance. Every year, the entire rail network is surveyed by BR's engineering staff and the work is done where it judges it necessary.

A1 (Safety)

14. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on improving safety on the A1.

Mrs. Chalker: The A1 generally has a better than average safety record. But the 12 major schemes, either under construction or in preparation and listed in the last roads White Paper will all contribute materially to improving safety, as will the many smaller schemes also in hand. A number of other possible schemes are under consideration.

National Bus Company

15. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport what provisions he intends to make for local managers and employees of the National Bus Company to purchase a stake in their company in his proposals for its denationalisation.

Mr. Ridley: As I informed the House on 30 November at columns 609-10, one of the objectives I intend to set for the National Bus Company is to offer managers and other employees opportunities to acquire the whole or at least a stake in the undertakings for which they work. We shall include any necessary provisions in the Bill which we hope to introduce shortly.

Buses (Safety)

16. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation stipulating, on safety grounds, a maximum age for buses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for the Department's vehicle examiners to determine whether buses are safe. There is no evidence to suggest that buses over 10 years old, for example, are inherently less safe than those with shorter lives.

Highlands and Islands Airports

17. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many offers have been received for the purchase of the Highlands and Islands airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Six proposals have been received and are currently being evaluated by the CAA in consultation with my Department and the Scottish Office.

Concessionary Fares

18. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce measures to protect existing concessionary bus fares in his forthcoming legislation on buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: We propose no change to the power of local authorities to decide what level of travel concessions they wish to provide.

Severn Crossing

19. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the progress of the feasibility study on the proposed second Severn crossing.

Mrs. Chalker: I expect to be in a position to make a statement within the next month.

Rail Passenger Services (Timekeeping)

20. Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will ask the chairman of British Rail what steps are being taken to improve timekeeping on passenger services.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has already set British Rail very clear objectives emphasising the need for reliable attractive and punctual services. Within the overall framework set by these objectives it is for the British Railways Board to decide what punctuality targets may be appropriate for particular groups of services and how best to achieve those targets. It has started to do so.

Concessionary Fares

21. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Transport on what basis funding for concessionary fares will be calculated.

Mrs. Chalker: The reimbursement of operators for concessionary fare schemes should properly reflect the costs. We are considering guidance on ways to achieve this.

Stansted-Heathrow (Inquiry)

22. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he intends taking following publication of the inspector's report on the planning inquiry on Stansted/terminal 5-Heathrow.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend announced on 21 November that Parliament would have an opportunity to debate airports policy in the light of the inspector's report. Following the debate, decisions on the planning applications will be taken under normal planning procedures.

Vehicle Exhaust Pollution

23. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action the Government intend to take in 1985 to reduce the pollution from vehicle exhausts.

Mrs. Chalker: Pollution from vehicles is controlled by European Community standards.

Regulations reducing the maximum lead content of petrol from 0·4 grammes per litre to 0·15 grammes per litre —the lowest level for leaded petrol permitted under the relevant directive—will come into force at the end of this year.

We have recently accepted the provisions for Directive 83/351/EEC, which contains the latest Community standards for gaseous emissions for cars. Discussions are now taking place in Europe on lower emission limits both for cars and diesel engined vehicles and we are seeking the lowest limits that can be achieved at reasonable cost by the use of advanced, fuel-efficient technologies.

New Road Construction

24. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent on new road construction in each of the past three years at constant prices.

Mrs. Chalker: At average 1982-83 prices, expenditure on new construction of motorways and trunk roads in England was £444 million in 1981-82, £530 million in 1982-83 and £501 million in 1983-84. The planned level of spending in 1984-85 is £552 million. The corresponding figures for local authority roads are £326 million, £406 million and £399 million (provisional). For 1984-85 the planned level is £463 million.

Motorway Construction (Midlands)

25. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about progress with motorway construction in the midlands.

Mrs. Chalker: Progress on the M42 Bromsgrove and Tamworth sections, which are the motorway schemes in the midlands currently under construction, is well under way. These sections are due to be fully completed in the summer of 1986.

Buses (White Paper)

26. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received on the buses White Paper, Cmnd. 9300; how many of these were favourable; and how many unfavourable.

32. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received about the effect on rural bus services of his White Paper on buses.

40. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received on the buses White Paper; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to the reply my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Members for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans), for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) and for Gower (Mr. Wardell) earlier today.

Motor Insurance (EC Directive)

27. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about consultations and progress on implementing the European Community directive on motor insurance.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department issued a consultation document last October, inviting comments by 31 December on the implications of giving effect to the directive. We are now considering the responses.

British Airways

28. Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what income he expects from the sale of British Airways.

Mr. Ridley: The Government's income from the sale of British Airways will depend on a number of uncertain factors, including the timing of the offer and the price of the shares as a result of the market's judgment of the company's value. It would not be right for me to venture an estimate of the proceeds in advance of the flotation.

Scottish Lowlands Airport (Policy Review)

29. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has reached a conclusion on the Scottish Lowland airports policy review.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. I have undertaken to the Scottish Affairs Committee that no final decision will be reached until my right hon. Friends and I have considered the report of the inquiry which they are conducting.

Taxis (Seat Belts)

30. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce legislation to require rear seat belts to be installed for the protection of passengers in taxi cabs, minicabs, hire cars and in cars for hire or rental, respectively.

Mrs. Chalker: As I have made clear to hon. Members before, no decision will be taken on the fitting of rear seat belts until the Select Committee on Transport has made its report. We have no plans to single out hire cars and taxis for special treatment.

Regional Airports

11. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has had recent consultations about the expansion of profitable regional airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We have had consultations with a number of regional airports about their development plans. I am engaged in a programme of visits to most of the major regional airports over the next two or three months. I recently announced new capital expenditure allocations for the expansion of a number of regional airports.

Road Construction (Investment)

31. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the level of planned investment for 1985-86 in trunk road and motorway construction.

Mrs. Chalker: Planned capital expenditure in 1985-86 on the trunk road and motorway programme in England is £742 million; £598 million of this is for new construction and £144 million for capital maintenance.

Bus Deregulation

33. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Transport what other countries have implemented a system of bus deregulation similar to that proposed in the buses White Paper.

Mr. David Mitchell: Several countries successfully allow substantial competition between bus operators, and some developed countries have recently liberated their licensing systems to a considerable degree. As far as I am aware, no country has abolished quantity regulation of local bus services in the precise way we propose.

Channel Link

34. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, in his discussions with French Ministers about the Channel link, any potential schemes have been eliminated.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Motorways (Speed Limits)

35. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he now has any plans to introduce legislation making the hazard advisory speed limits on motorways obligatory.

38. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he now has any proposals to make motorway advisory speed limits mandatory.

Mrs. Chalker: I am considering this possibility as part of my overall consideration of ways of improving motorway safety in bad weather conditions in the aftermath of the recent multiple accident on the M25. I shall make a statement as soon as possible.

Sealink

36. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assurances were sought during the negotiations on the sale of Sealink that through booking of services between rail and ferry would be preserved.

Mr. David Mitchell: As part of the sale agreement with the British Railways Board, the purchaser undertook to enter into contracts which included provision for through-ticketing, subject to agreement being reached on the accounting arrangements for payments due.

Concessionary Fares

37. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to amend the rules concerning concessionary bus fares.

Mr. David Mitchell: Outside London we intend to ensure that participation in concessionary fare schemes is open to all local operators and that reimbursement reflects the true costs of the concession given. We have no proposals for any change in the provisions on concessionary fares included in the London Regional Transport Act 1984.

Bus Maintenance (Safety Record)

39. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Transport how the safety record regarding bus maintenance compares between the private and public bus operators.

Mr. David Mitchell: The maintenance of all buses is important and my Department keeps a close watch on their operating standards in both the public and private sectors.

The effectiveness of bus maintenance is monitored (i) by the condition of the vehicles at their annual test; and (ii) by their condition at random spot checks.

As the following figures show, the initial pass rates in the annual test — that is, excluding passes following immediate rectification of faults — show no significant difference between private and public sector operators. Statistics of spot checks are not at present broken down by operator groups; this will be done in future.

I have no evidence that private sector vehicles are more prone to maintenance related accidents than other PSVs.

Pass rates at PSV annual test by operator group 1983-84

Operator	Number of Vehicles Tested	Initial Pass Rate Percentage
NBC	14,173	60
PTE	9,247	49
Local Authority	5,168	67
Private	28,634	56
London Transport	4,965	47
Scottish Bus Group	3,105	67
TOTAL	65,292	57

Road Passenger Vehicles (Safety)

41. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to review the safety standards of road passenger vehicles.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have no plans for a special review, but several new vehicle standards are being developed and we are continually looking at ways in which road passenger vehicles can be made more safe. We will, of course, look carefully at any recommendations on this that the Select Committee on Transport may make following its inquiry into road safety.

East Anglia (Rail Services)

42. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, at his next meeting with the chairman of British Rail, he will discuss the standard of rail services to East Anglia.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am aware of my hon. Friend's concern about this matter and I will draw it to the attention of the chairman of the British Railways Board.

Airports Policy

43. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport, how many representations on airports policy he has received since the publication of the inspector's report on 10 December.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend has received 63 written representations on airports policy arising out of the publication of the inspector's report on 10 December.

Drink-Driving Campaign

44. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how effective was his Department's campaign to minimise drunken driving over the Christmas and new year period.

Mrs. Chalker: It is still much too soon to make any assessment. The campaign was part of our continuing effort to educate young people about the dangers of drinking and driving and its achievements in this respect cannot be easily measured in the short term.

Bus Deregulation

45. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of the current amount of subsidy to bus operators now represented by cross-subsidy will be paid for by his Department following deregulation of the bus service.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am sure that operators will themselves continue to provide a great deal of cross-subsidy for commercial purposes. Where non-commercial cross-subsidy is withdrawn, I expect that loss to be offset by reductions in the industry's costs, brought about both by the presence of competition on commercial routes and by the process of tendering for contracts to run subsidised services. We have announced extra transitional support for rural bus services, starting at £20 million in the first year, to help stimulate new services and to provide support in case the benefits of competition in rural areas take time to work through.

Concessionary Fares

46. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends to introduce a token system for concessionary fares following implementation of the buses White Paper.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. It will be for individual authorities to decide the type of scheme they want.

Channel Tunnel

47. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that a Channel tunnel is built with the minimum of delay.

Mr. David Mitchell: As agreed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the French President at their summit meeting on 29 November, a joint official working group is now working urgently to prepare guidance for prospective promoters of any form of cross-Channel fixed link. Thereafter it will be for potential promoters to put forward specific proposals which take account of the working group's report for the two Governments' consideration.

Stansted Airport

48. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when making his decision on Stansted, he will bear in mind the conclusions of the decision on Maplin.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment will take every relevant factor into consideration in reaching a decision.

Heathrow (Air Transport Movements)

49. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport what repesentations he has received concerning the Government's proposal to limit the number of air transport movements at Heathrow to 275,000 per annum.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Over 130 organisations and individuals responded to the consultation document issued by my Department in July 1984 on how the proposed limit on air transport movements at Heathrow might be implemented. I have also received a further 160 letters about the limit.

British Airways

50. Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect he expects the sale of British Airways to have on competition between airlines.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Privatisation will remove from British Airways both the restrictions and the protection of state ownership so that it competes on a more equal footing with independent airlines in the United Kingdom.

Coal Industry Dispute

51. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning contraventions of the Road Traffic Act by firms transporting coal and coke from Port Talbot to Llanwern on the M4 motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: The licensing authority for the south Wales traffic area received a letter from the Transport and General Workers' Union and took appropriate action.

National Bus Company

52. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek an early meeting with the chairman of the National Bus Company in order to impress upon him the importance of replying promptly to letters from hon. Members of this House.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, but I will draw his attention to my hon. Friend's parliamentary question.

A13 (Statistics)

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people travelled daily from south-east Essex to London via the A13 in the latest year for which figures are available; and how this compares with five years earlier.

Mrs. Chalker: Data on the number of people travelling daily from south east Essex to London via the A13 are not collected by my Department.

However, the following estimates of annual average daily flow on the A13—both directions combined—for 1983 are readily available:

	Number
Pedal cycles	200
Two-wheeled motor vehicles	1,000
Cars and taxis	21,000
Buses and coaches	400
Other goods vehicles	3,000
All motor vehicles	28,000

Bus Industry

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport to which services the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell) was referring when he said to the Association of Transport Co-ordinating Officers on 29 November 1984 that the Government were going to set the bus industry free to provide the full range of services people wanted.

Mr. David Mitchell: I was referring to services whose provision is now inhibited by the need to obtain a road service licence.

Stoke-on-Trent (Trunk Roads)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the reasons for the delay in dealing with the problems arising from trunk road traffic through Stoke-on-Trent; when he plans to make a decision; and if he will expedite the preparation of the required data.

Mr. Ridley: We are currently re-examining the various options for dealing with the trunk road traffic in this corridor in order to determine the best solution. To do this we need the latest available traffic information and this is unavoidably taking a little while to assemble and analyse, although I appreciate the concern locally for an early decision. As my hon. Friend promised the representatives of Staffordshire county council and Stoke city council when she met them last July, as soon as this information is available she will be arranging a further meeting with them before deciding how to proceed. I anticipate now that this will be some time in the spring.

Motorways (Accidents)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of a night-time fatality on (a) an unlit part of a motorway and (b) a lit part of a motorway; and what is the cost of a day-time fatality on a motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: The estimated costs per motorway fatal accident in 1983 were £205,730 — daylight — and £179,990—darkness. Separate estimates for night-time accidents on lit and unlit motorway sections are not available.

Tolls

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has considered recently dispensing with tolls on all estuarial routes.

Mrs. Chalker: I have nothing to add to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) on 24 October 1983, at column 37, and my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) on 14 February 1984 at column 113. Estuarial tolls could not be dispensed with without suitable arrangements to repay outstanding debts of more than £500 million and to provide for future running costs.

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to ban drinking and driving.

Mrs. Chalker: The current legislation has been in force for under two years and it is sensible to give it a fair trial before considering possible changes.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider initiating a campaign throughout the year to deter motorists from drinking and driving.

Mrs. Chalker: A continuous programme of major publicity would be very expensive and not necessarily effective. Although our main campaigns have taken place over Christmas and new year period, their aim has been to encourage a responsible attitude to drinking and driving at all times of the year.

I shall be considering the case for taking action over a longer period or at different times of the year as part of our continuing effort to educate people about the grave dangers of drinking and driving.

"Stay Low" Campaign

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the lessons learnt from the recent "Stay Low" campaign.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall be considering both the effect of the campaign, when detailed information is available, and the wider circumstances surrounding it, as soon as possible.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement as to the results of the recent "Stay Low" campaign; and whether he was satisfied with the publicity surrounding it.

Mrs. Chalker: It is still too soon to make any assessment of the results of the campaign. I believe that the publicity which the campaign prompted can be taken as a welcome sign of increasing public awareness of the problem of drinking and driving, although I regret the concentration on the slogan rather than upon the campaign as a whole.

Articulated Heavy Lorries

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what change has occurred to the accident rate for articulated heavy lorries over the past three years.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Articulated heavy goods vehicles: accidents per hundred million vehicle kilometres; 1981 to 1983 Great Britain.

	Number
1981	58·0
1982	69·2
1983	63·0

Three-wheeled Vehicles

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce measures to restrict the driving of battery powered three-wheel vehicles on the public highway.

Mrs. Chalker: The construction and use of such vehicles is controlled by road traffic legislation. The recently introduced Sinclair vehicle satisfies the requirements in the Electrically Assisted Pedal Cycles Regulations 1983, and may therefore be driven on public roads—except motorways—by anybody of 14 or more.

A6 (Barton Bypass)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce the preferred route of the A6 Barton bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: I hope it will be possible to announce the preferred route in the very near future.

M40 (Extension)

Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many copies of the inspector's report on the public inquiries into the M40 extension were distributed by his Department; and how many copies were accompanied by copies of the assessor's report.

Mrs. Chalker: A total of 91 copies of the full inspector's report, including those placed in the Library, were distributed at the time of the announcement of the decision of the Secretaries of State following the public inquiries. Of these, 29 copies were put on deposit for public inspection and in the case of the nine major deposit points a copy of the assessor's report was also made available for inspection. Following the announcement, a further 15 copies of the inspector's report, and 10 copies of the assessor's report, have been sent to people, on request.

Copies of the section of the inspector's report containing his findings of fact, conclusions and recommendations accompanied the decision letter which was sent to the over 1,600 people who took part in the inquiry or separately represented their interest.

Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the estimated cost of widening the M1 contained in his Department's evidence to the public inquiry into the M40 extension; and how this figure compares with the estimate contained in his Department's evidence to the public inquiry into the A1-M1 link road.

Mrs. Chalker: At the M40 public inquiries, the estimated capital cost of widening that part of the M1 which the M40 will relieve was given in the Department's evidence as £300 million. This was based on the actual cost of widening the M1 between junctions 5 and 8. The figure of £42 million stated in evidence by the Department at the public inquiries into the M1-A1 link was for widening the much shorter length of the M1 which would be affected by that scheme—that is, between junctions 16 and 17—was calculated on the same basis.

Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Transport why those copies of the inspector's report of the public inquiries into the M40 extension placed by him in the Library were not accompanied by copies of the assessor's report, which is listed as an appendix to the inspector's report; and if he will now place copies of the assessor's report in the Library.

Mrs. Chalker: It is the exception rather than the rule that copies of inspectors' reports in major highway proposals are placed in the Library. Appendices to such reports are usually only placed at specified deposit points.

However, in view of the interest, copies of the assessor's report to the inspector who held the M40 inquiry have been placed in the Library.

British Rail (Diesel Multiple Units)

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to reach a decision on British Rail's proposal for investment in a further build of new diesel multiple units.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have today written to the chairman of the British Railways Board giving approval for the board's proposal to invest about £60 million in the construction of 240 new medium-weight diesel multiple units, or "sprinters".

M65 (Blackburn)

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made by his Department's consultant in respect of the route of the Blackburn to M6/M61 section of the M65 motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: Messrs. Howard Humphreys and Partners are carrying out the investigation necessary for them to produce the detailed report required by next autumn.

SCOTLAND

Pupils (Statistics)

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of pupils currently in primary, secondary, further education and in total for each Scottish education authority.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The numbers of pupils in education authority primary, secondary and special schools and colleges of further education, at the latest available date, are given in the following tables.

Table 1

Mallaig (Road Improvements)

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the proposed date of completion of the new trunk road entering Mallaig; and when the road improvements to continue the double width road from Lochailort to Mallaig are expected to be completed.

Mr. Ancram: The scheme for the new trunk road entering Mallaig will be ready to start towards the end of 1985 if outstanding objections can be resolved. Depending on site and weather conditions, construction may take up to two years to complete. The preparation of schemes to improve the remainder of the road from Mallaig to Lochailort is continuing.

Child Care

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the national child care organisations in Scotland which have received Government funding in each of the past five years to the latest date; and if he will list the amounts granted.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is set out in the table. The figures include assistance for organisations' general activities and support for training. They do not include funding under the urban aid programme.

Prevention of Terrorism Act

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons were detained under the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism Act over the Christmas holiday period to the latest date in Scotland; how many persons were charged; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: In the period 24 December 1984 to 10 January 1985, both dates inclusive, three persons were detained by the police in Scotland under the Prevention of Terrorism legislation. No charges were brought, but one of those detained was subsequently the subject of an exclusion order, made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, which prohibits that person from being in, or entering Great Britain.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) male and (b) female employees were in full-time employment in Scotland at the most recent date for which figures are available; and how this figure compared with one year previously and with figures for May 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information in the precise form requested is not available. However, the estimates of female employees in full-time employment in June 1979, 1983 and 1984 are 566,000, 498,000 and 501,000 respectively; all females in employment at the same dates are 898,000, 865,000 and 889,000. The estimates for all males in employment at these dates are 1,209,000, 1,073,000 and 1,064,000 respectively: at September 1981, 95 per cent. of the estimated number of all male employees were in full-time employment. The estimates for 1983 and 1984 are provisional.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his most up to date figure for the numbers of patients on Health Service waiting lists; and how this compares with the numbers for one, two, three and five years previously.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) on 5 December 1984.

Grey Seals

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest assessment of the grey seal population in and around Orkney.

Mr. John MacKay: The latest estimate from the sea mammal research unit of the Natural Environment Research Council is that there were about 21,000 grey seals in the breeding colonies in and around Orkney at January 1983.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to control the grey seal population in and around Orkney.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend is considering the views expressed by conservation and fishery organisations on the need for grey seal management and hopes to reach a decision on this shortly.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recommendations he has received as to the advisable population of grey seals in and around Orkney.

Mr. John MacKay: No such recommendations have been received. On the general question whether there is a need to control grey seal populations I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) of 26 June 1984.

Forestry

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1982-83 and 1983-84 the Forestry Commission issued felling licences which permitted the clear-felling of broadleaved woodlands for conversion to agricultural land and how many hectares of woodland this totalled in each case.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1984, c. 255]: The information is as follows:

1984	126	438

This represented a rate of loss of broadleaved woodland to agriculture of 0·06 per cent. a year.

In the nine month period 1 April 1984 to 31 December 1984 the figures were:

Number of Licences issued	Area of Woodland (hectares)

The recent substantial drop in the numbers of such cases is in large part a reflection of the presumption operated by the Forestry Commission against the conversion of broadleaved woodland sites to agricultural use.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions in 1982-83 and 1983-84 the Forestry Commission issued felling licences which permitted felling of broadleaved woods, without there being conditions attached for the replanting solely of broadleaved trees; and how many hectares of woodland this totalled in each year.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 19 December 1984, c. 255]: The information is as follows:

1984	269	749

A significant proportion of these cases involved replanting with a mixture of conifers and broadleaves, designed to lead eventually to woodlands of a predominantly broadleaved character. Only 23 licences covering some 65 hectares were issued during these two years which provided for replanting solely with conifers.

In the nine month period 1 April 1984 to 31 December 1984 the figures were:

Number of licences issued	Area of woodland (hectares)

of which only one licence covering 0·8 hectares provided for replanting solely with conifers.

The recent substantial drop in the number of cases is in large part a reflection of the presumption operated by the Forestry Commission against the conversion of broadleaved woodland sites to agriculture or to coniferous woodland.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases arising from the miners' strike have now been dealt with in (a) district and (b) magistrates' courts; and if he will specify the names of the courts.

Mr. Ancram [pursuant to this reply, 3 December 1984 c. 43]: I understand that six cases arising from the miners' strike have now been dealt with in the district courts; three cases at Kilmarnock, two at Ayr and one at Haddington. No cases have been taken before stipendiary magistrates.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Westminster Hospital

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the present balance of funds accumulated by gift or endowment and remaining at the disposal of Westminster hospital.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The annual accounts of the special trustees for the Westminster and Roehampton hospitals for 1983-84 submitted to our Department show a balance of funds of £3,512,437·78 as at 31 March 1984.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the number and names of wards and beds which have been closed since 1979, together with the specialties which have been transferred or terminated at Westminster hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect the sort of detailed local information centrally which would be required to answer fully the hon. Member's question. However, information available indicates that there has been no change in the range of specialties at the Westminster hospital since 1979, and that over the period 1979-1983 the average daily number of available beds at the hospital rose from 339 to 405, and the number of in-patient cases rose from 11,386 to 14,850.

The hon. Member may wish to seek further information from the chairman of the Victoria health authority.

Social Security Payments

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost of social security payments in the United Kingdom per head of the working population for 1983-84; and what is the proportion spent on administrative costs.

Mr. Whitney: The cost of social security payments in the United Kingdom was nearly £1,350 per head of the working population in 1983-84, about 4·5 per cent. of this being the cost of administration.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the letter sent to the Minister for the Disabled on 15 December by the chairman of the Joint Committee for the Disabled about increases in the mobility allowance and in motoring costs from 1978 to 1984, together with his reply.

Mr. Newton: The letters are as follows:

I enclose a printout detailing the cost of motoring from 1978 to 1984 and the value of the mobility allowance over the same year.

As you will see, the "index" value of MobA (1978 = 100) has risen—as you rightly stated at the DIG/MENCAP conference—to 200 in 1984. According to our calculations, however, the "index" of motoring costs has risen from 100 to 206 over the same period. The motoring costs are all based on a selection of the AA cost items and, as you will also see, the value of the mobility allowance kept up well with the cost of motoring until April 1982. Since then the cost has gone ahead of the value of the mobility allowance.

We trust that this trend will be handsomely reversed at the next uprating.

Peter Large

Thank you for your letter of 15 December enclosing a comparison of the increases in mobility allowance and motoring costs from 1978 to 1984.

Whilst I note the results of this comparison, I must point out that the rate of mobility allowance has never been related directly to the expenses of running a car. The allowance is intended to be a contribution towards the additional costs which severely disabled people incur in getting out and about but there is no requirement to have the use of a motor vehicle. Indeed an important part of the purpose of moving from the provision of vehicles to the payment of a cash allowance was to extend help to those unable to use a vehicle of their own; and beneficiaries can spend the money in any way they wish.

Under the provisions of the Social Security Act 1975, the Secretary of State for Social Services is required to consider each year whether the rate of mobility allowance should be increased having regard to the national economic situation as a whole, the general standard of living, any changes in taxation which directly affect the cost of motoring for persons in receipt of mobility allowance and such other matters as he thinks relevant. he is also required to lay a statement before Parliament setting out his conclusions and the reasons for them.

Mobility allowance has received very favourable treatment under this Government. The increase to £20 a week from last November means that it has risen 100 per cent. in cash terms since July 1978. This compares with an increase in the Retail Prices Index of 81·1 per cent. over the same period, and an increase in the Transport and Vehicles Group Index (which covers motoring costs, petrol and oil, motor insurance, fares and rail transport) of 82·8 per cent.

We have also made the allowance more effective by taking it out of income tax, by extending VAT relief and introducing car tax relief in respect of motor vehicles designed or adapted for disabled people, and by removing VAT on cars provided under the Motability scheme.

I hope that this explanation shows that, on the broader comparisons which I have outlined, mobility allowance, far from losing its value, has been increased significantly in real terms under this Government. I cannot, as you will appreciate, anticipate decisions on the amount of the up-rating next November.

Tony Newton

The costs have been taken from AA schedule of estimated standing and running costs for a car with an engine capacity of 1,001-1,500 cc.
The car licence and garage/parking have been omitted because disabled motorists in receipt of the mobility allowance are exempted from such charges.
The charges for interest on capital have also been omitted as this is a somewhat controversial item and not one that would directly affect many disabled people.

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any proposals for relaxing the requirements to be met by applicants for mobility allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no such proposals.

Under-16-year-olds (Contraceptive Pill)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received to date concerning his decision to appeal to the House of Lords in the Gillick case.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: To date we have received letters from three hon. Members and 11 members of the public opposing our decision to appeal to the House of Lords and from two hon. Members and four members of the public in support of our decision.

Children in Care

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider issuing revised guidelines to ensure that proper references are taken from the police, probation service and any other interested parties prior to the employment of any social workers, child officers and child minders for children in care.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has recently announced his intention to review the arrangements for the disclosure of information to prospective employers about any relevant criminal background of persons seeking to work with children. Pending the outcome of that review we propose to remind local authorities and voluntary organisations of the need to satisfy themselves about the suitability of persons appointed to work in the child care field and of the consultancy service which the Department provides to assist them in this matter.

Warnock Report

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how Her Majesty's Government now intend to proceed in consequence of the Warnock committee report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are considering the public and parliamentary response to this report and the need for any legislation on the subject matter it considered.

Surrogate Motherhood

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now bring in immediate legislation to outlaw surrogate motherhood; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are aware of the widespread and deep concern about the activities of commercial surrogacy agencies. The Government are considering urgently what action should be taken.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about surrogate motherhood since 4 January.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: To date we have received four written representations including one from my hon. Friend. The Government are very much aware of the widespread and deep concern about the activities of commercial surrogacy agencies.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to introduce legislation to forbid surrogate motherhood.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are aware of the widespread and deep concern about the activities of commercial surrogacy agencies. We are considering urgently what action should be taken.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, if he has any proposals for relaxing the requirements to be met in respect of applications for attendance allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no such proposals.

Fuel Allowance

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, if he will now authorise a severe weather fuel payment to those on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: The chief adjudication officer has today decided to advise local adjudication officers that for the past week the conditions for the award of payments under single payments regulation 26 on the grounds of exceptionally severe weather have been satisfied in two weather station areas covering East Anglia and parts of southern England. This advice is based on the criteria published in paragraphs 7426-7459 and Appendix 19 of the S Manual (a copy of which is in the Library), and on temperature data just obtained from the Meteorological Office. People eligible for supplementary benefit may therefore be entitled to payments towards the cost of extra fuel they have had to use because of the cold weather. We are publicising the help which is available, and leaflets explaining how to claim can be obtained from local social security offices. Decisions on whether individuals are entitled to such payments are a matter for the independent adjudicating authorities.

Child Care

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the national child care organisations in England and Wales which have received Government funding in each of the past five years; and if he will list the amounts granted.

Mr. John Patten: It is difficult to identify precisely which voluntary organisations should be regarded as "national child care organisations" because of the diversity of interests many large voluntary bodies have. I refer the hon. Member to the replies of my hon. Friend on 14 December 1983 at columns 509-516 and 22 June 1984 at columns 316-320 to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) which listed all the grants given to voluntary organisations by this Department in 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Retirement Pensioners

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he has given to improving the real value of pensions and other allowances available to retirement pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: With the November 1984 uprating the value of the retirement pension has increased by 3·6 per cent. in real terms—representing £1.25 a week for a single person and £2.00 a week for a married couple—since the Government came to office in 1979. The pledge to protect pensions and linked long-term benefits against price rises has thus been more than met. We have made provision for uprating in November this year in line with price rises in the twelve months to May 1985.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will compare the value of pensions and other allowances available to retirement pensioners with those which currently pertain in the other countries of the European Community.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to section IV of the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the Member States of the European Communities, Portugal and Spain (position at 1 January 1984)", a copy of which is in the Library.

Hospitals (Ethnic Committees)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report, region by region, the hospitals that have set up ethnic committees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information of this sort centrally and it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Distinction Awards

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has to overhaul the distinction awards system.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no proposals for an overhaul of the distinction awards system. The system is under constant review by the professions and our Department and changes are made by mutual agreement.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which new specialties, which did not exist in 1948, now attract distinction awards by clinical practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All specialties involving clinical work with NHS patients, whether existing in 1948 or created since, attract distinction awards.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many paediatricians and paediatric pathologists are in receipt of distinction awards.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest figures available are as at 31 December 1983. At that date 205 paediatricians and 27 paediatric surgeons held awards. Paediatric pathology is not recognised as a separate specialty for distinction award purpose and no figures are available.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women doctors are in receipt of distinction awards.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest figures available are as at 31 December 1983. At that date there were 339 women consultants holding awards.

Low Birthweight Babies

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what resources he is making available to those health authorities seeking funding for new methods of dealing with the problem of low birthweight babies in order to reduce the perinatal and neonatal mortality rate;

(2) if he is satisfied with the level of resources available through inner city partnership schemes to assist health authorities in introducing family worker projects concerned with the problem of low birthweight babies.

Mr. John Patten: The Government believe that a specific central allocation of funds for the development of maternity services is not appropriate. It is for health authorities to plan and fund services in the light of local needs and priorities.

Resources available through inner city partnerships are not earmarked for any specific initiative. However, the needs of areas of social deprivation are taken into account in the current method of allocating resources to regional health authorities.

Health Authorities (Managers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the names and former occupations of all general manager appointments made to date as a result of the Griffiths proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether staff expected to undertake additional duties and responsibilities consequent upon the appointment of a general manager will be regraded.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 511]: The grading of an individual officer is a matter in the first place for the local health authority in the light of the agreements of the appropriate Whitley council. However, I do not expect any immediate regradings to take place of other staff as a direct consequence of the appointment of a general manager by an authority.

Canada (Reciprocal Social Security)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in consultation with the Canadian Department of Health and Welfare in the preparation of a comprehensive social security convention with Canada; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: My hon. Friend will be aware of the general position on this matter which is contained in the reply of my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) at column 445. The draft provided by the Canadian Department of Health and Welfare is the subject of discussion between officials of this Department and their Canadian counterparts. The main cost of any convention would be paying pension increases to United Kingdom pensioners in Canada, and the high cost of this —up to about £35 million a year—makes it unlikely that a convention could be implemented in the near future.

Human Embryos (Implantation)

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision is made for National Health Service staff, both medical and non-medical, who have a conscientious objection to being involved in any techniques involving the implantation of human embryos into the wombs of other animals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: So far as I am aware, no such technique or procedure has ever been carried out in the National Health Service or in this country at all. There is no statutory or other provision covering the involvement of staff, but I am quite sure that no health authority would ever require any staff to take part in such a procedure.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service staff have been, or are, involved in techniques involving the implantation of human embryos into the wombs of other animals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: So far as we are aware, this procedure has not been carried out at any centre in the United Kingdom.

Contraception, Sterilisation and Abortion Services

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies have been carried out over the last 12 years into the cost effectiveness of contraception, sterilisation and abortion services; and what were the findings.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The only major study in this country of which we are aware is "Family Planning—the Benefits and Costs" by W. A. Laing, published by the Policy Studies Institute in May 1982. This concluded that the costs associated with an unplanned pregnancy were significantly greater than those of measures designed to prevent it.

Contraceptive Services

Mr. Terry Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost of contraceptive services in England for the years 1975 to 1984, inclusive, at 1983-84 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Precise details of the costs of contraceptive services provided through the National Health Service are not available, though it is possible to identify, for each financial year, the fees paid to general medical practitioners for the provision of these services, and to estimate the basic ingredient cost of the medicines and devices prescribed, and the costs of family planning clinics. Estimates of total cost on these services for England are given at 1983-84 prices—as measured by the GDP deflator.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to increase benefits for pensioners and other groups on low incomes to assist them with the purchase of drugs which will no longer be available on National Health Service prescription after the introduction of limited list prescribing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There will be no need for this. My intention is that for all patients who need medicines of the kinds covered by my proposals, there will be a range of effective medicines available on the NHS.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what alternative methods of saving money on the National Health Service drugs bill he considered before introducing his proposals for a limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Various methods of saving money on the National Health Service drugs bill, including generic substitution, were considered before we introduced our proposals for a limited list. No other scheme offered such immediate and worthwhile savings without damage to patient care.

Divorced and Separated Women (Rents)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has plans to provide financial assistance to women who, following a divorce or a separation, are left in sole occupation of rented housing accommodation and are held liable for any accumulated arrears of rent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: A woman who continues to occupy the family home following a divorce or separation and who is liable to pay rent and/or rates or makes payments as if liable, may be entitled to housing benefits for her rent and/or rates. If supplementary benefit is also in payment, a deduction of £1·45 a week may, in certain circumstances, be made from that benefit and paid direct to the landlord towards any rent arrears for which she is responsible. There is no provision to make special payments for the arrears. We have no plans to change these arrangements.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his most up-to-date figure for the numbers of patients on Health Service waiting lists; and how this compares with the numbers for one, two, three and five years previously.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information in given in the table. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate and many of those on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission. In addition, figures on waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. The amount of overstatement cannot be readily estimated but is thought to exceed 10 per cent. nationally and could be considerably more.

Benefits (Review)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services at how many meetings, other than public meetings, of his review committees into (a) children and young persons' benefits, (b) supplementary benefit and (c) housing benefit the Treasury has been represented.

Mr. Newton: As I explained in my reply on 3 December at column 80, the Treasury, like other Government Departments, has been involved in the work of the review teams through normal official machinery and attendance at meetings. It would not be appropriate to give further details of the internal working arrangements of the individual teams, or of the review as a whole.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Minister for Health last met the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 28 December 1984.

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services who is responsible for preparing the terms of reference for the management consultants who are going to review the functions and working of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The regional health authority and our Department.

Hospital Patients (Dental Examinations)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance has been issued by his Department regarding the frequency of dental examinations for patients in long-stay hospitals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Departmental guidance makes clear that health authorities are responsible for the dental care, including comprehensive treatment, of all long-stay hospital inpatients. It is for health authorities and responsible dental consultants to decide the frequency with which patients require dental examinations.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many young people have suffered a deduction in supplementary benefit for (a) refusing to take up a youth training scheme place and (b) leaving a youth training scheme place in the period since the provision was first introduced.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of young people who had their supplementary benefit reduced because they had, without good cause, (a) refused or (b) left prematurely a place on the youth training scheme during the period 23 November 1983 to 20 November 1984—the latest date available—were 1,163 and 10,701, respectively.

Records of supplementary benefit reductions for this reason were not kept prior to 23 November 1983.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC (Regional Development Fund)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by region in England how much European regional development fund aid to date has been devoted to (a) infrastructural projects and (b) industrial projects; and if he will give the total for England in each category.

Mr. Trippier: The total aid to date allocated from the quota section of the European regional development fund to infrastructure and industrial projects in England is shown in the following table:

Region	Infrastructure £ million	Industry £ million	Total £ million
Northern	179·4	78·2	257·6

Local Enterprise Week

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will write to local co-operative development agencies to invite their participation in the 1985 local enterprise week.

Mr. Trippier: I welcome the participation of local co-operative development agencies in local enterprise week and will write to them with details of plans for the week.

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish in the Official Report the total regional development grant paid in each standard planning region for each year since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is given in the following table:

Standard Planning Region

Regional Aid

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide a breakdown of the figure of £1 billion given to the House on 9 January, Official Report, column 831, as being the total provided in financial assistance to the northern region since 1972.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is as follows:

	£ million
Regional Development Grants	1,240·9
Section 7 Grants	93·8
Section 7 loans/equity	18·2
Industry Schemes Grants	12·7
General Schemes Grants	11·6
General Schemes loans/equity	0·5

	£ million
Total grants	1,359·0
Total loans/equity	18·7

The figure for regional development grants relates to the northern region, including Cumbria; those for other assistance relate to the present north-eastern region.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the total expenditure by central Government in regional aid to each English region and Wales for each year since 1979 in cash and real terms using 1984 as the base year.

Mr. Trippier: Government expenditure since 1979 on regional aid to Wales and the regions of England is as follows:

Wales	179·9	151·4	209·5	220·7	189·7	113·5

Notes:

* All figures are gross and include payments to nationalised industries.

† Includes West Midlands for earlier years. Oswestry TTWA lost its Intermediate Area status on 1 August 1982.

‡ The 1981-82 figures for England include items which cannot be broken down between the Northern and North West regions. The amount involved at current prices is £15·7 million (£17·5 million at 1983-84 prices).

The items included in the expenditure are regional development grants and regional selective financial assistance under the Industrial Development Act 1982, and expenditure on land and factories in the assisted areas by the English Industrial Estates Corporation and the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the per capita spending on regional aid by central Government for each region in England for each year since 1979.

Mr. Trippier: The following table is based on the total of expenditure on regional development grants and regional selective assistance under the Industrial Development Act 1982 and its predecessor legislation, and expenditure on land and factories in the assisted areas by the English Industrial Estates Corporation. It gives the amount of such expenditure per member of the yearly average of the working population in the calendar year in which the financial year ends as the working population is a better indicator than the total population of a region's economic base. The 1983 working population figure is the latest available and has been applied to the figures for the financial year 1983-1984.

Northern	82·7	76·4	75·7	91·1	82·2	65·8

East Midlands*	1·9	1·8	1·9	3·6	5·7	7·3
South West	3·7	4·2	4·4	5·6	6·1	4·5

* Includes west midlands for earlier years. Oswestry TTWA in the west midlands lost its intermediate area status on 1 August 1982.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what, in respect of the year 1983-84, was the total number of jobs created in each region in England by means of selective financial assistance; and what is his estimate of the average cost of such jobs created.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is not available. However, under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982, the assistance offered for job creation projects together with the related estimated number of jobs to be created and the average cost of each job, during 1983-84 by English regions is as follows:

	Offer Value £ million	Estimated New Jobs	Cost per Job £
North-East	12·46	5,770	2,160
North-West	6·7	2,775	2,415
Yorkshire and Humberside	7·6	3,313	2,293
South-West	3·67	1,365	2,690
East Midlands	6·35	2,577	2,465

The jobs are expected to be created over a four to five-year period if the projects go according to plan.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of applications for selective financial assistance approved by his Department for each region in England in 1983-84.

Mr. Trippier: The number of applications offered selective financial assistance under sections 7 and 8 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 in each region in England in 1983-84 is as follows:

	Section 7 Number of offers	Section 8 Number of offers
North-East	19[illegible]	186
North-West	138	574
Yorkshire and Humberside	118	439
South-West	40	480
East Midlands	78	396

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Trials (Personal Health Data)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General how many Crown court cases arose in 1984 in which disclosure of personal health data was necessary before a verdict could be reached.

The Attorney-General: I regret that this information is not available.

Sunday Trading

Mrs Renée Short asked the Attorney-General how many cases of criminal proceedings arose in 1984 resulting from transgressions of Sunday trading restrictions; and in which areas such offences took place.

The Attorney-General: Section 71 of the Shops Act 1950 assigns responsibility for the enforcement of the provisions of the Shops Act 1950 to the local authority for the district concerned. The Director of Public Prosecutions, for whose work I have responsibility, has not dealt with any such cases in 1984. The total number of prosecutions brought in 1984 under the 1950 Act is not yet available, but will be included in the statistics relating to crime and criminal proceedings for 1984 when they are published by the Home Office.

Appeals

Mr. Corbett asked the Attorney-General what is the average length of time between a prisoner applying for leave to appeal and the decision being given by a judge on such applications; and what was the average time taken in making such decisions for each year since 1978.

The Attorney-General: Information is not available in the form requested. The time interval varies from case to case and depends on such factors as the the length and complexity of the trial, the number of defendants, the length of sentence, whether the appeal was against conviction sentence or both, and whether or not the application was pursued to the full court. The total number of cases outstanding in the Court of Appeal, criminal division has, however, decreased from 3,333 at the end of 1983 to 2,545 at the end of 1984.

EMPLOYMENT

Pay Movements

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the movement of pay in the wages council sector has changed over the last 10 years as a proportion of the national average.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information required is set out in the following table:

	*All Wages Boards and Councils	All industries and services	All Wages Boards and Councils as a percentage of all industries and services
	£	£	per cent.
1974	30·6	41·7	73
1984	104·6	160·1	65

* Includes Agricultural Wages Boards.

Source: New Earnings Survey.

Notes: Figures in columns 1 and 2 above are average gross weekly earnings of full-time men aged 21 years and over and full-time women aged 18 years and over, whose pay is unaffected by absence.

Young Workers Scheme

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate his Department has of the proportion of jobs supported by the young workers scheme which would have existed in any case.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available in the form requested. The young workers scheme is designed to encourage employers to employ more young people at more realistic rates of pay. Survey evidence suggests that at least 20 per cent. of jobs supported were created directly because of the help it provides. It is likely that a significant proportion of the remainder would not have existed in the absence of more realistic rates of pay for young people.

Training and Special Employment (Cost)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the cost of all the Government training schemes and special employment measures for each year from and including the financial year 1972-73; and what was the average number of participants in each year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The cost of all Government training schemes and employment measures for each financial year from 1974-75 to 1983-84 together with, where available, the number of participants is outlined in the following tables.

Information in respect of 1972-73 and 1973-74 is not readily available. The number of participants is expressed variously as annual number of entrants, course completions, average filled places, etc according to the availability of statistics.

* RSSL ran from 13 October 1975 to 30 September 1976—figure of 30,179 represents total entrants to scheme and covers two financial years (1975-76 and 1976-77).
† AES ran from 7 August 1978 to 30 June 1979 and figure of 1,446 entrants covers 1978-79 and 1979-80 financial years.
‡ EAS was operated as pilot scheme in five areas only between January 1982 and August 1983 thereafter it has been operated nationally.
‖ It is estimated that some 40,000 are helped in a full year. Participants are volunteers who remain on the unemployment register.
¶ Figures relate to persons assisted under the employment transfer scheme only and exclude persons assisted under the job search scheme, free forward fares scheme and the speculative temporary transfer scheme as figures are not available for these schemes.
• Currently supports 96 projects.
* Scheme closed for applications 31 August 1978.
• Scheme closed for applications 31 March 1979.
* Scheme closed for applications 31 March 1980.
 Scheme closed for applications 31 March 1981.
‡‡ Scheme incorporated into Community Programme.
†† Number supported at the end of each financial year.

Wages Councils

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state separately how many employers and how many employees were covered by each wages council for the latest period during 1984 for which statistics are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Estimates of the coverage of wages councils are derived from records kept by the Wages Inspectorate which are on the basis of establishments rather than employers. The latest figures for establishments and workers covered by each council are as follows:

Council	Number of establishments at 1 January 1984	Estimated number of workers at June 1982
Aerated Waters	630	15,000
Boot and Shoe Repairing	2,372	7,100

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied that the Christmas undertaking under the youth training scheme that all unemployed minimum age school leavers would be offered a place by Christmas has been met; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I am very happy to say that the Government's undertaking has been effectively met for the second successive year. There are over 300,000 young people on the youth training scheme and on 3 January only 3,850 youngsters were waiting for the offer of a place. The comparable figure for last year was 4,320.

These results are a tremendous achievement by all concerned — the Manpower Services Commission, the careers service, employers, trade unions, local authorities, colleges and voluntary organisations. Their support for the Government's commitment to training is much appreciated. I am also delighted to see the clear evidence that young people recognise that the youth training scheme offers a real chance to improve the basic skills necessary to compete effectively in the labour market.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Terrorism and Security (Statistics)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the statistics for terrorist activity and security forces' activity in Northern Ireland for the year ended 31 December 1984.

Mr. Scott: I regret that these statistics are not yet available, but I expect them to be so shortly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Miss Hilda Murrell

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Mercia giving the reasons why two detective sergeants and a detective constable were suspended before August 1984 during the course of the inquiry into the murder of Miss Hilda Murrell; when he expects disciplinary procedures to be completed; and whether the detectives were suspended on full pay or half pay.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable of West Mercia that on 7 August 1984 he announced that three officers, two from his force and the third from the West Midlands police, attached to the No. 4 Regional Crime Squad, were suspended from duty during the course of a disciplinary inquiry into whether they had failed properly to carry out their duties. The inquiry began on 21 June 1984; one officer from West Mercia and the officer from West Midlands were suspended on 28 June and the second officer from West Mercia was suspended on 2 August. A report of the inquiry will be submitted to the deputy chief constable shortly who will then take a decision on whether disciplinary charges should be brought. In accordance with normal practice the officers were suspended on full pay, but one has since resigned from the police service.

Police (Baton Rounds)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which senior officer has been designated as officer in charge of the use of baton rounds in the Metropolitan police area; and how many police officers in London have been trained in their use.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The senior officer in charge of the use of plastic baton rounds in the Metropolitan police district is the Deputy Assistant Commissioner (Operations) in "A" Department (Administration and Operations). Forty firearms instructors and 46 other officers are at present trained in the use of plastic baton rounds.

Itinerants

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers Her Majesty's Government have to control the movement of itinerants from European Economic Community countries into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: The admission of foreign nationals is controlled by the provisions of the Immigration Act 1971. The practices followed in the administration of the Act are set out in the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules" (HC 169) laid before Parliament on 9 February 1983, which recognise the right to admission under Community law of certain nationals of European Community countries.

Cruelty to Animals

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress towards the introduction of legislation to replace the Cruely to Animals Act 1876 following the publication of the White Paper in May 1983.

Mr. Mellor: We have made considerable progress since the publication of the White Paper. Extensive consultations have been held with interested parties, and aspects of the proposals have been tested, refined and developed. We hope shortly to issue further information on developments in policy. It remains our firm intention to introduce new legislation at the earliest possible opportunity, and we shall be ready to do so as soon as that opportunity occurs.

Drink-Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people were breathalysed over Christmas and the new year within the Metropolitan police area; and of those how many were found positive;

(2) if he will call for reports from each chief constable as to the number of people tested for drunken driving over the Christmas period and as to the number of positive tests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Police forces submit, throughout the year, returns to the Home Office on breath tests, but the returns take some time to compile and process and all police forces have not yet compiled their figures covering the Christmas and new year period. Considerable disruption and expense would be involved in asking them to alter the standing arrangements for submitting these returns now and bringing forward the normal schedule for processing them. When all the returns for 1984 have been received, it is planned to publish a statistical bulletin on the use of breath tests in 1984, on similar lines to "Statistics of Breath Tests, England and Wales 1983" (Issue 20/84), a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This will include a special analysis of the figures over the Christmas period and will be available well before arrangments have to be made for next year.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions for drink-driving offences there have been in each of the past five years and to date in 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The available information is for findings of guilt at all courts and is given in table 5 of the Home Office statistical bulletin, "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales 1983" (Issue 24/84), a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Information for 1984 and 1985 is not yet available.

Random Breath Tests

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider the introduction of random breath tests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A police constable in uniform has a general power to stop any vehicle and he may require a motorist to take a roadside breath screening test if he has reasonable cause to suspect that the motorist has alcohol in his body, or following the commission of a moving traffic offence, or if the motorist has been involved in an accident. We are not convinced that it is necessary to extend these wide powers.

Unmarked Police Cars

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis over the use of unmarked police cars within the Metropolitan police area; and if he will publish any guidelines issued in the Official Report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the force uses unmarked vehicles for a wide range of purposes including CID inquiries, surveillance, responding to certain complaints about speeding and miscellaneous support functions. Whether or not an unmarked police vehicle is to be used in a particular operation is a matter for the senior officer concerned. No guidelines have been issued specifically on the use of unmarked police cars.

South West African People's Organisation

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received objecting to the presence in the United Kingdom of members of the South West African People's Organisation.

Mr. Waddington: None.

Wintex-Cimex '85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his Department's contribution to Wintex-Cimex '85.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Officials from the Department have been involved in the planning of the United Kingdom's contribution to the exercise and will participate during the exercise itself.

Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984

Mr. Mates asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has appointed a person to report annually on the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984.

Mr. Brittan: I am pleased to say that Sir Cyril Philips has accepted this appointment. I hope to receive his first report next month.

PRIME MINISTER

European Community Budget

Q7. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what are the implications for the agreements secured at the Fontainebleau and Dublin summits on Common Market finances of the decision of the European Assembly on 13 December to reject the 1985 budget; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I regret the decision of the European Parliament to reject the 1985 draft budget. But this action affects neither the agreement on future United Kingdom abatements secured at the Fontainebleau European Council; nor the agreement on budget discipline adopted during the Dublin Council. These have been accepted by all member states.

Industrial Relations

Q75. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister whether the Government have any further proposals to make to improve industrial relations in the countries of Britain.

The Prime Minister: The Trade Union Act 1984, which is designed to ensure that trade unions are more democratic and their leaders more accountable to their members, will not be in full operation until later this year. It is therefore too early to say what further specific legislative measures may be introduced. However, we are considering what might usefully be done to deal with the special problems of industrial action in essential services and we shall take whatever additional steps may be necessary to ensure that there is a balanced and effective legal framework for the conduct of industrial relations.

Engagements

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 January.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Nuclear Tests (Radiation)

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister how many records of atomic test veterans have now been surveyed.

The Prime Minister: The study of atomic test veterans which the National Radiological Protection Board is undertaking is progressing to plan, as detailed by the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement in October 1983. About 20,000 British service men and civilians participated in the entire programme; almost all these individuals are known, and their records are being made available to the NRPB for it to consider for inclusion in the study.

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on what is being done to assist the Australian Royal Commission's inquiry into the atomic tests held at Maralinga.

The Prime Minister: Her Majesty's Government are devoting very considerable effort to assisting the Australian Royal Commission in the limited time given to it by the Australian Government for executing its inquiries. Priority has been given to making available information from the sources most likely to provide relevant material. So far, the Ministry of Defence has reviewed and supplied some 250 relevant trials reports and other documents; access has been granted to about 100 unique headquarters' files and other documents pertaining to the period of the programmes in advance of their normal 30-year release to the Public Records Office; and 25 United Kingdom witnesses, including high ranking staff in responsible positions during the test programmes, are being assisted to testify.

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister whether British service men were deliberately exposed to the effects of radiation during tests in the South Pacific in the 1950s.

The Prime Minister: There is no truth in the allegations that British service men were used as "guinea pigs". No British service men were exposed unnecessarily to levels of ionising radiation in excess of the prescribed limits. These limits were comparable with those which apply to radiation workers today.

Approximately 15,000 of the 20,000 participants at the tests were not exposed to additional radiation at all. Most of those who were exposed to ionising radiation other than natural background received a radiation dose less than one tenth of the limit prescribed for radiation workers. Only very few (fewer than 30 individuals, service men and civilians, for the entire programme) experienced exposures greater than 70 millisieverts; these exposures were within the special higher integrated dose for cases of extreme necessity and had to be authorised by the test director.

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister how many people have been included in the survey of atomic tests service men who were not, at the time considered to be at risk from radiation exposure.

The Prime Minister: The National Radiological Protection Board, which is carrying out the study of United Kingdom participants in the United Kingdom atmospheric nuclear weapon tests, is being given information, including dose records, about all the service men and civilians who are known to have been involved in the test programmes. As explained in the NRPB protocol issued in September 1983, the board will consider which participants should be included in the study. The question of how their analysis will take account of the 5,000 or so with dose records is entirely a matter for the board.

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government will extend the survey of service men involved in tests held in the South Pacific in the 1950s to examine genetic effects on children of service men; and when the existing survey will be completed.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement on 31 October 1984, at columns 1120-21.

Trident

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the effect of the exchange rate on the cost of Trident; if she will estimate the present cost of the project; and how this compares with the 1980 estimates.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is currently reviewing the estimate of cost of Trident and expects to make an announcement to Parliament shortly. The latest published estimate for the Trident programme based on the use of the Trident D5 missile, is £8,729 million at an exchange rate of $1·53=£1. The original estimate for Trident given in 1980 and based on the Trident C4 missile, was £4,500 million to £5,000 million. Of the increase in cost, about £1·25 billion relates to exchange rate variations.

Tax and National Insurance (Thresholds)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what would be the loss in revenue if (a) income tax thresholds and (b) national insurance thresholds were raised to £2,500 for a single person and £5,000 for a married couple per year; and what would be the financial effect on a man with a wife and two children with an income of £100 per week and whose rent and rates were £20 and £5, respectively, if at the same time child benefit, all housing benefits and family income supplement were abolished.

The Prime Minister: The cost of increasing the single person's income tax allowance to £2,500 and the married man's allowance to £5,000 would be about £7·6 billion in a full year at 1984-85 levels of income. The reduction in national insurance contributions if the lower earnings limit was raised to £2,500 per year for single people and to £5,000 per year for married couples, in relation to their joint earnings, would be about £1·1 billion in 1984-85. This estimate assumes no change in the contracted-out rebate in respect of people remaining liable to contributions. On the assumptions given, the family specified would lose £788 in 1984-85.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Petitions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will propose to the House the reintroduction of the system of counting the number of signatures on public petitions.

Mr. Biffen: I have no such proposals. It is already open to an hon. Member presenting a public petition to draw the attention of the House to the number of signatures attached to it.

ENERGY

Mutual Defence Agreement

Mr. Benn asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will publish any exchange of letters between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government that constitute a waiver on the stipulation in the mutual defence agreement 1958 (as amended in 1959 and subsequently) that nuclear materials bartered under this arrangement shall be used for the furtherance of defence purposes by each state;

(2) whether the release of information by the United States Energy Secretary disclosing the isotopic composition of United Kingdom origin civil plutonium, transferred under the mutual defence agreement 1958 (as amended in 1959), was with the agreement of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend gave the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 2 July 1984, at column 36, in which he explained that it is not Her Majesty's Government's practice to release details of exchanges such as those between the United States and United Kingdom Governments on the mutual defence agreement.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make available more detailed information on the specific projects supported by the Energy Efficiency Office in the interests of furthering energy efficiency.

Mr. David Hunt: I have placed a note, describing the excellent schemes and projects currently available to assist all sectors in achieving greater efficiency in the use of energy, in the Library of the House, together with the relevant publications and leaflets which are available from the Energy Efficiency Office at my Department.

TRANSPORT

Lorry Weights

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to increase the maximum weight of lorries from 38 tonnes.

Mr. Ridley: No.

Drink-driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will issue guidance to those who continue to drink and drive.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall continue to take every possible opportunity to make it clear that drinking and driving is irresponsible and potentially dangerous.

M25 (Noise)

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be in a positon to announce his decision on further noise reduction methods on the Chertsey-Wisley section of the M25.

Mrs. Chalker: I hope to write to my hon. Friend within the next three to four weeks.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Aid

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the percentages of gross national product spent on overseas aid by the following countries compares with that spent by the United Kingdom: (a) the United States of America, (b) Japan and (c) the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Raison: In 1983 British aid was 0·35 per cent. of GNP. By comparison the USA's share was 0·24 per cent. and Japan's 0·33 per cent. The USSR is not a member of the Development Assistance Committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development which collates aid statistics, and does not itself publish this information. However, it is estimated that the USSR's development aid represented 0·19 per cent. of GNP in 1983.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British Government financed personnel are currently working overseas as part of aid programmes; in which countries they are working; what tasks they are performing; and what is the estimated total cost to the Government of such programmes.

Mr. Raison: The latest complete information is for 1983. There were 738 fully funded and 1,779 partly funded personnel, and 1,041 volunteers serving in over 100 countries overseas under the aid programme at 31 December 1983 at a total cost of just over £70 million. They were working in a wide variety of disciplines including renewable natural resources, public administration, education and health. A list of the countries where they worked and details of the full range of disciplines are given in tables 19 and 14 respectively of the 1984 edition of "British Aid Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many overseas students or trainees are currently studying in the United Kingdom as part of United Kingdom overseas aid programmes; at which establishments such students are studying; what courses they are on; and what is the estimated total annual expenditure on any such schemes.

Mr. Raison: On 31 December 1983, the latest date for which official aid statistics are available, 5,336 students and trainees from developing countries were on courses in the United Kingdom financed by the British overseas aid programme.

The additional information which my hon. Friend has requested is not immediately available, but I will write to him shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures are to be taken to implement United Nations Security Council resolution 558 which was unanimously adopted on 13 December in order to prevent imports of arms from South Africa into the United Kingdom and its dependencies.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom does not obtain its arms and military equipment of the type covered by Security Council resolution 558 from South Africa. We supported the adoption of SCR 558 and expect other UN member states to consider carefully its provisions, but it is a non-mandatory resolution.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Government officials visited South Africa during 1984; and if he will name these officials and the purpose of their visits.

Mr. Rifkind: There are no centrally compiled lists of visits by government officials to overseas countries. I regret, therefore, that the information requested by the hon. Member is not available.

Apartheid

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the United States of America and (c) other member states of the EEC voted on the resolutions on apartheid adopted at the 39th Session of the United Nations General Assembly in particular resolution 39/2 and resolutions 39/72 A to G.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested is as follows:

Resolution 39/2: The United Kingdom and USA abstained. Other members of the EC voted in favour.

Resolution 39/72A: All members of the EC, and the USA, voted against, except Greece which abstained.

Resolution 39/72B: The United Kingdom and USA voted against; other members of the EC voted in favour.

Resolution 39/72C: All members of the EC, and the USA, voted against, except Greece, which voted in favour.

Resolution 39/72D: The United Kingdom, FRG, Netherlands and Denmark and the USA, abstained. Other members of the EC voted in favour.

Resolution 39/72E: The United Kingdom and USA abstained; other members of the EC voted in favour.

Resolution 39/72F: Adopted without a vote.

Resolution 39/72G: The United Kingdom and USA voted against, five EC members abstained and four voted in favour.

International Terrorism

Sir Frederic Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further initiatives Her Majesty's Government favour in establishing greater co-operation within the member states of the Council of Europe to counter international terrorism.

Mr. Renton: The Ministers of Justice of the Council of Europe adopted a resolution on the fight against terrorism and international organised crime in May 1984. Member states have since been considering how best to give effect to the resolution. We are playing a full part in these discussions.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Zimbabwe.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend paid his first visit to Zimbabwe from 5 to 8 January 1985. While there he was able to have most useful and friendly discussions with Mr. Mugabe and other senior Zimbabwean Ministers covering a wide range of international and bilateral issues. He also met a number of Opposition leaders and representatives of the private sector; and saw something of Zimbabwe's agriculture.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Pupil Statistics

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the proportions of pupils in comprehensive schools, secondary modern schools and grammar schools in each local education authority in 1984.

Sir Keith Joseph: The proportions of secondary pupils —excluding middle deemed secondary—in comprehensive—excluding sixth form colleges—secondary modern and grammar schools in each local education authority in England in 1984 were:

Nursery Schools

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many new nursery schools or nursery classes were opened in 1984 and how many were closed.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available in the form requested. However, between January and November 1984, 76 proposals made under sections 12 or 13 of the Education Act 1980 were approved by my right hon. Friend, or determined by the local education authority concerned, to change significantly the character of primary schools by the introduction of nursery classes. During the same period my right hon. Friend approved no proposals to close nursery schools or to cease providing nursery classes in primary schools. The continuing need to remove surplus school places from use did result, however, in the approval or local determination of proposals to close a number of primary schools which provided nursery classes. In such cases local education authorities normally ensure that alternative nursery provision is available, and the availability of such an alternative is one of the factors which my right hon. Friend takes into account when considering these proposals.

Adult Education

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what study has been made by his Department of the effects on local authority provision and the take-up of places on adult education courses since the enforcement of their liability to value added tax.

Mr. Brooke: No formal study has been undertaken or is planned, but what information is available to the Department suggests value added tax liability for adult education classes has not been as severe as had been feared by some.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the average percentage increase in the fees charged for adult education courses from 1983-84 to 1984-85; and whether he will break down this figure into courses (a) liable and (b) not liable for value added tax.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not available.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the current financial arrangements for adult education classes.

Mr. Brooke: The financial arrangements for local education authority adult education classes are for the individual authority concerned to determine. The financial arrangements for university extra-mural departments and the Workers Educational Association, which are aided by my right hon. Friend, are being adjusted as from 1985-86.

Children (Education Services)

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce legislation requiring local education authorities, in their provision of services to children in their area, not to discriminate in the quality or extent of provision of services on the grounds that the children are educated at a school other than a local education authority maintained school; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Government would deplore any attempt at such discrimination. My right hon. Friend is ready, under existing legislation, to take action against any authority which he was satisfied was acting unreasonably —in the sense in which that word has been interpreted by the courts—in this regard.

Universities (Proceeds of Sales)

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to change the rules governing the retention by universities of the proceeds of sale of Exchequer-funded property; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: On 21 January 1982, at column 182, I announced the experimental introduction of new arrangements to allow universities greater freedom to retain the proceeds of sale of land or buildings acquired with assistance from public funds. The purpose of these arrangements was to help universities to make the most economic and efficient use of accommodation and to identify property that was not being fully or effectively used and might be surrendered.

Before the introduction of the new arrangements a university that sold property it wished to replace by new buildings or adaptation might, with Treasury agreement, be given a special grant towards the cost up to the amount of the proceeds surrendered. The revised arrangements announced in January 1982 further provided for universities to be able to retain up to 100 per cent. of proceeds of sale up to £100,000 for use within two years on building or adaptation work. Where the proceeds of sale were more than £100,000 the university could either retain £100,000 under the rules for the smaller projects or up to 50 per cent. of the proceeds of sale for use within three years on building or adaptation work or the acquisition of property.

Following consultation with the University Grants Committee I am satisfied that these arrangements have contributed to the capacity of universities to make the most effective use of their sites and properties and that it would be appropriate to consolidate and extend them. Universities will be informed in detail of the new arrangements by the UGC, but the main features are as follows:

(a) Where a university disposes of sites or properties (including leases of 25 years or more) the university will be allowed to retain up to £200,000 of the proceeds of sale on condition that:
  (i) the committee is notified of the university's proposal to dispose of the property and of the purpose to which it is proposed to use the proceeds;
  (ii) the sale proceeds are used within three years of receipt by the university on building or adaptation work, repairs or maintenance or the acquisition of property. Sale proceeds may be used (subject to Treasury approval) for projects related to university/industry collaboration.

(b) Where a university disposes of property where the proceeds of sale are more than £200,000 the university may with the UGC's approval and as an alternative to (a) above retain up to half of the proceeds of sale for the purposes and on the conditions outlined in (a) above.

(c) Universities will also be allowed (subject to the approval of UGC) to use up to 100 per cent. of the proceeds of sale on cost-effective schemes to rationalise or replace existing facilities.

(d) Proceeds of sale and any accuring interest not used as provided for above will be surrendered to the Consolidated Fund. Universities will be expected to be able to account separately for the retained proceeds of sale and any related interest.

(e) Assets acquired with general income will be covered by the same general rules as assets financed from capital grant, although any amount to be surrendered to the Consolidated Fund will be calculated taking account of the proportion of general income coming from non-Exchequer sources at the time the asset was acquired.

(f) The limit on the amount universities may spend on minor works will be increased from 3 per cent. to 4 per cent. of recurrent grant.

(g) Universities will be allowed to retain rents from properties which are in commercial use of benefit to the institution concerned and rents from properties occupied by displaced tenants. Net rental income from any other Exchequer-funded property not in normal university use will continue to be returned to the Consolidated Fund unless the UGC exceptionally agrees otherwise. The case for the university continuing to hold such property will be kept under review by the UGC.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Whisky (Labelling)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in what form he intends to propose to require labelling of whisky of various alcoholic strengths; whether such requirements will include the term understrength or the percentage of alcohol; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on 22 November 1984 at columns 267-68. We are still considering the ways in which the labelling of understrength spirits shall be improved and we will be announcing our proposals in a few weeks' time.

Soft Drinks (Regulations)

Mr. Shersby asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has made to the soft drinks industry for the amendment of the Soft Drink Regulations 1976.

Mrs. Fenner: We have made no proposals to the soft drinks industry for the amendment of the Soft Drinks Regulations 1964. However, my officials have had informal discussions with the industry on possible updating of these regulations which were the subject of a report by the Food Standards Committee in 1976.

Shellfish

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is aware of any pollution of the marine environment surrounding the British Isles that detrimentally affects the development of shellfish.

Mr. MacGregor: Certain types of marine pollution are potentially detrimental to shellfish. Accordingly, discharges into the marine environment are subject to a range of statutory controls.

Annual Review

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the 1985 annual review of agriculture.

Mr. Jopling: A White Paper setting out the conclusions of the 1985 annual review of agriculture will be laid before Parliament today. The White Paper shows that gross output in current prices is forecast to rise by 6 per cent. in 1984 to £12,349 million. This reflects increases in the value of output of nearly all major commodities but most noticeably in the arable sector where production was helped by the exceptionally favourable growing conditions. The only major sector to show a decline in output was milk and milk products. This was due in part to the milk qouta scheme and in part to the very dry summer.

Due largely to the exceptional weather conditions, farm incomes showed a significant recovery during 1984 and on one measure, "farming income", increased by some 22 per cent. to £1,826 million. In real terms, however, farm incomes remain some 8 per cent. below the 1982 level and well below the levels achieved in the mid-1970s. The profitability of the intensive livestock sectors showed a welcome improvement during the year. Otherwise there has continued to be an imbalance between the relatively prosperous arable sectors and the livestock sectors. This underlines the urgent need for reform of the CAP.

DEFENCE

"Jim Davidson's Falklands Special" (ITV Programme)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost to public funds of the Independent Television programme entitled "Jim Davidson's Falklands Special", transmitted on Christmas Eve 1984.

Mr. Stanley: The television programme itself was made at no cost to public funds. None of the costs of the tour of Ascension Island and the Falklands were borne from public funds with the exception of some costs, largely transport, of the combined services entertainment team which amounted to some £12,000. Thirteen shows were given to service audiences who greatly appreciated them.

Trident

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the additional capital works, their cost and timetable that are required for the Trident project at Rosyth dockyard and Clyde naval base, respectively.

Mr. Butler: The capital works required at the Clyde submarine base and Rosyth dockyard include handling, storage, armament processing, berthing, docking, engineering, training and refitting facilities. They will be needed to support not only the Trident submarines but also the expanding fleet of nuclear powered fleet submarines (SSNs).

In presenting the 1984 notice of outline planning development and its accompanying environmental impact assessment for the Clyde submarine base, the Department provisionally estimated the overall construction costs at some £350 million. The comparable costs at Rosyth are estimated at some £200 million. All these facilities will be available in phase with requirements.

Type 22 Warship

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is now his intention to award the pending naval order for the two type 22 warships to one or more of the three short listed yards solely on the basis of the most commercially competitive tenders received.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

National Radiological Protection Board (Survey)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much money was paid to the National Radiological Protection Board in connection with its survey of the records of atomic test veterans in 1983 and 1984; and how much the board will receive in 1985.

Mr. Butler: It is not the practice of the Ministry of Defence to disclose such precise information, which is "Commercial in Confidence", but it is anticipated that the total cost will be about £300,000.

Falkland Islands (Anniversary Service)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his plans for a third anniversary service and parade at St. Paul's to commemorate the Argentine surrender in the Falklands.

Mr. Stanley: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 21 December 1984, at columns 375-76, the service to which the hon. Member refers is a commemorative one to mark the unveiling of a south Atlantic campaign memorial bearing the names of all those who lost their lives.

Falklands Veterans (Benefits)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the precise nature of the action which his Department is taking to ensure that benefits available to service men as a result of the Falklands war are well known.

Mr. Stanley: As far as benefits for which my Department is responsible are concerned, awards under the armed forces pension scheme are made as a matter of course to those service men who are eligible. No publicity is considered necessary, and we have no reason to think that awards have not been made to every eligible service man.

HMS Repulse

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what incidents involving HMS Repulse have been reported to his Department; what action he has taken as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Reports on the activities and deployments of all submarines in the Polaris force are made regularly to my Department. It would not be in the public interest to detail these. If the hon. Member wishes to inform me of any particular incident he has in mind, I will see if I can assist him.

HMS Conqueror (Crew Members)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if all those crew members of HMS Conqueror who left the Royal Navy after the Falklands war were asked to sign MOD form 135.

Mr. Stanley: Yes.

HMS Conqueror (Missing Log Book)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in discovering the whereabouts of the missing log of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Stanley: I cannot at present add to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) on 30 November 1984 at columns 593-94.

Mr. N. Sethia (Diary)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent steps he has taken concerning the classification of the diary of Mr. N. Sethia, a crew member of HMS Conqueror; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said in his reply to the hon. Member on 30 November, at column 594, the diary contains classified information. This assessment remains unchanged.

Tendering Procedures

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what organisational changes he has made in order to cope with the new open tendering system; and (a) how many extra staff have been taken on to cope with tendering procedures and (b) what new departments or sections have been established to handle tendering.

Mr. Butler: The Department's policy of opening defence requirements to as many companies as possible has not led to any changes in organisation. No additional staff have been recruited for this purpose, nor have any new departments or sections been established.

ENVIRONMENT

Unused Land

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will reduce the minimum criteria for the inclusion of unused and under-used parcels of land in public land registers from one acre to half an acre.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend does not propose to do so at present. The resources that would be required for this task are at this stage better devoted to securing the disposal of or bringing into use land that is currently registered.

Ironstone Mineworkings (Walsall)

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the extent of former ironstone mineworkings in the metropolitan district of Walsall; and what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take to seek to minimise the consequences.

Mr. Macfarlane: Ironstone was mined in several areas in Walsall during the 19th century, often in association with coal and sometimes with limestone. The exact extent of former ironstone workings is not known. However, most such workings are at some depth, and it is likely that they are completely collapsed and pose little threat to surface development.

In contrast, limestone workings remain largely uncollapsed, and the area potentially affected by such underground workings in Walsall is approximately 370 hectares (about 3·5 per cent. of the borough's land area). Following completion of the study of limestone workings in the west midlands by Ove Arup and Partners, which was published in July 1983, Walsall borough council is currently undertaking intensive investigations, funded by my Department's derelict land grant, to resolve uncertainties and determine the need for treatment. The Black Country Limestone Advisory Panel, chaired by Sir Edward Parkes, will continue to advise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on priorities and value for money in relation to investigations and remedial measures, and funds will be made available for such further investigations and treatment as are considered necessary.

Southern Water Autority

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the increased revenue to the Southern water authority which will arise from the planned increase in charges for each of the next three years can be spent by the authority on capital works without any constraints imposed by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government set financial targets and external finance limits for water authorities each year. The higher financial target being set for 1985-86 should allow Southern water, consistently with its external finance limit for that year, to increase its spending on capital works by about 10 per cent. and further increases are provisionally planned for later years.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what savings in 1986-87 and 1987-88 to the domestic ratepayer in West Yorkshire he envisages from the proposed abolition of the West Yorkshire metropolitan county council.

Mr. Waldegrave: I envisage that rates in West Yorkshire in 1986-87 and 1987-88 will be lower than they would otherwise have been as a result of the savings flowing from the abolition of the West Yorkshire county council.

Housing Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in respect of each housing authority in England, what is the estimated amount of capital receipts from the sale of dwellings under shared ownership, improvement for sale and homesteading in 1984-85.

Sir George Young: I regret that the information is not available.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in respect of each housing authority in England, what is the estimated amount of capital receipts from housing land in the year 1984-85.

Sir George Young: It is estimated that some £100 million of capital receipts from the sale of housing land will be generated by local authorities in England in 1984-85. Information on the amount generated by each local authority is available only for the first six months of 1984-85. I am today placing the details in the Library.

Local Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much it is estimated each English local authority's usable capital receipts in 1985-86 would increase if the prescribed portion of usable capital receipts from housing land were to remain at 100 per cent. rather than 30 per cent.

Sir George Young: The information is not available at individual local authority level. Capital receipts from the sale of housing land are forecast at £100 million in 1985-86. At a prescribed proportion of 100 per cent. local authorities in total would therefore be able to supplement their basic housing investment programme allocations by £100 million rather than £30 million.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much it is estimated each English local authority's usable capital receipts in 1985-86 would increase if the prescribed portion of usable capital receipts for the sale of dwellings with shared ownership, improvement for sale and homesteading were to remain at 100 per cent.

Sir George Young: The information is not available at individual local authority level. Capital receipts from the sale of local authority dwellings under build for sale, improvement for sale, homesteading and shared ownership initiatives are forecast at £27 million in 1985-86. At a prescribed proportion of 100 per cent., local authorities would therefore be able to supplement their basic housing investment programme allocations by £27 million rather than £8·1 million.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in respect of each housing authority in England, what are the forecast capital receipts in 1985-86 giving rise to the published total of £1,595 million.

Sir George Young: The Department does not make forecasts of capital receipts at the individual authority level. Details of the forecast for 1985-86, by type of receipt, were given in reply to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) on 12 December 1984, at column 500.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the proportion of the proposed housing investment programme allocation for Southampton city council in 1985-86 which is attributable to the exercise of ministerial discretion;

(2) what is the proportion of the proposed housing investment programme allocation for Southampton city council in 1985-86 which is attributable to each of the indicators in the generalised needs index;

(3) what is the proportion of the proposed housing investment programme allocation for Southampton city council in 1985-86 which is attributable to the defective dwellings indicator in the generalised needs index.

Sir George Young: Approximately 62 per cent. of Southampton's housing investment programme allocation for 1985-86 is attributable to the application of the generalised needs index and 38 per cent. is attributable to ministerial discretion. Full details of the GNI scores for Southampton and all other authorities are in the Library.

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will reconcile the figures in his Department's letter to local authorities, dated 20 December 1984, regarding housing investment programme allocations 1985-86 with his statement on 19 December, Official Report, column 306, that the overspend on council's capital programme could amount to £1 billion or more.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 5]: There is no direct connection between the figures. The figure of £1 billion which I used on 19 December 1984 referred to the possible level of overspend, on all the services covered by the main local authority cash limit taken together, which could have occurred in 1985-86 if action had not been taken to reduce the risk of a breach of the cash limit. That action includes reducing the rate at which capital receipts can be used. The figures in the Department's letter of 20 December explain the make-up of the gross provision of £2,324 million for housing investment alone by local authorities in 1985-86.

Radioactive Waste (Salford)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received protesting against the dumping of radioactive waste material in the Lumn's lane area of Salford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department has received 53 representations, comprising petitions and letters from individuals, protesting against the disposal of low-level radioactive waste at Greater Manchester council's waste disposal site at Lumn's lane, Salford.

The four authorisations granted under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 permit controlled disposal of low-level radioactive waste. They were issued following a thorough assessment of the suitability of the site by the Radiochemical Inspectorate in consultation with local and other authorities concerned. Most of the waste arises from essential medical and research work in the area and the disposals need to take place so that the work may continue. Disposals have taken place at similar sites in Greater Manchester for many years and no hazard has arisen as a result. My right hon. Friend has carefully considered the representations but he is satisfied as to the safety of the disposals authorised which relate to waste at very low levels of radioactivity.

Private Rented Accommodation

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on 20 December, Official Report, column 266, if he will now define in detail what further steps are being considered to build on measures already taken by the Government since 1979 to encourage a greater availability of accommodation for rent in the private sector.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend is examining all the legislation relating to the private rented sector. I cannot speculate on the outcome.

Regional Industrial Assistance

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total expenditure by local authorities for each region in England on regional industrial assistance for each year since 1979 in cash and real terms using 1984 as the base year.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Hydrocarbons (Exploration)

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the need to safeguard the environment of rural areas especially sensitive to development from disturbances caused as a result of exploration for hydrocarbons.

Mr. Macfarlane [pursuant to his oral reply, 28 November 1984, c. 925-26]: My Department has today issued a circular to local authorities containing guidelines for planning control over oil and gas operations. I am placing a copy in the Library of the House. This publication fulfils the commitment I gave in April last year to issue guidelines to mineral planning authorities. I am grateful to everyone who commented on the draft circular when it was issued for consultation in August last year.

ARTS

Manchester Opera Festival

Mr. Arnold asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what representations the Arts Council has received about the financing of the proposed Manchester opera festival in the summer of 1986; whether any meetings are proposed with the organisers of the festival; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The management of the Palace theatre, Manchester, has asked the Arts Council to commit itself to subsidising the opera festival planned for 1986-87. The council has indicated its interest but cannot commit itself to the expenditure of money which Parliament has not yet voted.

WALES

Cervical Cancer Screening

39. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the provisions for cervical cytology screening by the Mid-Glamorgan family practitioner committee.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In Mid-Glamorgan, as elsewhere in Wales, a cervical cytology screening service is available from general medical practitioners, family planning clinics and local health authority clinics as well as through antenatal, postnatal and gynaecological outpatient clinics.

Mid-Glamorgan family practitions committee operates a system for recalling patients for further routine screening. At present there is a backlog of patients awaiting recall and the Mid-Glamorgan health authority, which is responsible for the provision and monitoring of screening facilities, is currently considering with the family practitioner committee how best to alleviate this problem.

Regional Aid

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the total expenditure by local authorities in Wales on regional industrial assistance for each year since 1979 in cash and real terms using 1984 as the base year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Local authorities provide a wide range of services which are of benefit to industry in their areas. Comprehensive information could not be meaningfully provided. However, some information is available from the annual outturn forms as follows:

	Grants and advances for industrial and commercial purposes		Capital expenditure on industrial estates
	Cash	*1984-85 prices	Cash	*1984-85 prices
1979-80	296	450	3,941	5,997
1980-81	1,475	1,892	8,890	11,405
1981-82	164	191	7,717	9,002
1982-83	1,397	1,528	16,024	17,526
†1983-84	1,012	1,060	17,442	18,270

* Deflated to 1984-85 prices using the GDP deflator.
† Provisional.
Note:
The information has been derived from the annual capital outturn forms.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the per capita spending on regional aid by central Government in Wales for each year since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The per capita spending on regional aid by central Government in Wales since 1978-79 in the years ended 31 March was:

1978-79	62
1979-80	61
1980-81	100
1981-82	116
1983-84	66

The highest figures for the years 1980-81 to 1982-83 largely reflect the regional development grant payments towards a few major capital intensive projects.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what, in respect of the year 1983-84, was the total number of jobs created in Wales by means of selective financial assistance; and what is his estimate of the average cost of such jobs created.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Offers of regional selective assistance accepted in the year ended 31 March 1984 for projects in Wales were expected to lead to the creation of 11,846 jobs. The average cost of regional selective assistance for each of these jobs is estimated at £2,682.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of applications for selective financial assistance approved by the Welsh Office in 1983-84.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In the year ended 31 March 1984, 307 applications for regional selective assistance were approved by the Welsh Office.

EC (Regional Development Fund)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by district in Wales how much European regional development fund aid committed to Wales to date has been devoted to (a) infrastructural projects and (b) industrial projects; and if he will give the total for Wales in each category.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is as follows:

Notes:

1. All figures have been independently rounded. Individual components will not therefore sum to the all Wales total.
2. All figures are net of decommitments notified by the European Commission.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will provide an estimate of the number of jobs created by the Welsh Development Agency (a) in Wales as a whole and (b) by county in Wales since 1979;

(2) if he will give the total expenditure by the Welsh Development Agency for each year since 1979 by county in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have asked the Welsh Development Agency to write to the hon. Gentleman.

Wintex '85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on Welsh Office involvement in Wintex '85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Two officers of the Department will attend some of the meetings.

Regional Emergency Committee

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the date of the last meeting of the regional emergency committee for Wales; what were the reasons for convening the committee at that time; and if he will make a statement on the committee's deliberations.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Officers representing departments and organisations likely to be involved if the Wales emergency committee were set up met on 20 November 1984 to consider their role under the arrangements described in Home Office circular No. ES 2/1984.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the members of, and organisations or departments involved in, the regional emergency committee for Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: It is not practicable to define membership more precisely than in Home Office circular No. ES2/1984. Emergency committees are not standing bodies and their membership would reflect the need at the time they were constituted.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the powers of the regional emergency committee for Wales; and under what circumstances it would assume these powers.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Wales emergency committee, as such, would have no powers, although its individual members would have such powers as might be delegated to them by their own Ministers or organisations.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether the regional emergency committee for Wales, as referred to in Home Office circular No. ES2/84, will be convened between 26 February and 16 March.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There are no plans fpr any such meeting.

SCOTLAND

Hip Operations

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people living within the Highland health board area currently await hip replacement operations; and what is the present waiting time for such operations.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Standard Grade Examination

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the length of the delay in introducing phases 2 and 3 of the standard grade examination reform for 14 to 16-year-olds.

Mr. Younger: Following advice from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities given in the light of the action by members of the Educational Institute of Scotland to boycott curricular developments, I announced on 11 December that phases 2 and 3 of the implementation of standard grade would have to be postponed. I have now decided that the period of postponement should be limited to one year: subjects due to be introduced in 1985 as part of phase 2 of the programme will therefore now be introduced in 1986 for first examinations in 1988; and phase 3 will follow one year later. I very much regret this delay, which has been caused by the irresponsible actions of the EIS. I hope, however, that the additional time can be used constructively to prepare for the new courses. In line with our continuing commitment to the introduction of standard grade, the Government will play their full part, in consultation with the educational interests involved, in ensuring that these courses are effectively prepared and taught.

I confirm that the courses in phase 1 subjects, English, Mathematics, General Science and Social and Vocational Skills, which have already started, will continue as planned for first examinations in 1986. I look to the teachers to fulfil their responsibilities for preparing and teaching these courses; and we for our part are looking for ways of helping them to do so, consistent with the essential principles of standard grade. For this reason I have already made it clear that up to a further £100,000 will be made available in the current financial year for the preparation and distribution of relevant teaching materials. This is in addition to the substantial help which has already been provided.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what discussions he has had with the European Economic Community Commission regarding the eligibility for European regional development fund assistance of areas within the Highlands and Islands Development Board area, which no longer enjoy regional development status;

(2) whether areas within the Highlands and Islands Development Board area, which no longer enjoy regional development status, will continue to qualify for assistance from the European regional development fund.

Mr. Allan Stewart: As I indicated in my replies on 3 and 6 December, at columns 42 and 263, to the hon. Members for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) and for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), the eligibility of the board's area for European regional development fund assistance has not been affected by the recent changes to the assisted area map.

NHS (Expenditure)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the increase in spending on the National Health Service in Scotland in real terms giving the percentage increase, for the period from May 1979 to date, and for each year giving the figures and the percentage increase in real terms year by year; and what are the most up-to-date plans for the future.

Mr. John MacKay: Gross expenditure on the National Health Service in Scotland from 1979 is as follows:

1979-80	1,053
1980-81	1,331
1981-82	1,519
1982-83	1,648
1983-84	1,758
*1984-85	1,900

* Provisional.

In cash terms, gross expenditure has increased since 1979-80 by over 80 per cent. This has enabled health services to expand by over 7 per cent. The Government's plans for public expenditure in Scotland in 1985-86, announced by my right hon. Friend on 13 December, provide for an increase of £94 million net for the NHS or about 5 per cent. more than expected expenditure in 1984-85.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will give a breakdown of the figures of the increase in resources to health boards in Scotland between 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86; and if he will publish a table indicating the increases in real terms for each health board, as well as the average for the whole of Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend announced on 13 December 1984 that cash provision for the hospital and community health services programme and associated centrally managed programmes in 1985-86 would be some £75 million higher than this year's level of expenditure. This represents an increase of 5·5 per cent., 1 per cent. more than the forecast level of inflation.

Allocations to individual health boards for 1985-86 have yet to be determined. Cash allocations to health boards for 1984-85, and the increase these represent over allocations for 1983-84, are as follows:

Health boards	1984-85 recurrent expenditure allocation (net)	Increase over 1983-84 allocations Cash	Percentage
Argyll and Clyde	93,066	5,306	6·05
Ayrshire and Arran	63,601	4,380	7·40
Borders	18,707	1,287	7·39
Dumfries and Galloway	33,115	2,179	7·04
Fife	61,473	4,319	7·56
Forth Valley	59,986	3,870	6·90
Grampian	112,558	7,708	7·35
Greater Glasgow	343,543	18,878	5·81
Highland	47,571	2,979	6·68
Lanarkshire	104,552	6,881	7·05
Lothian	206,832	12,945	6·68
Orkney	3,412	252	7·97
Shetland	4,277	340	8·64
Tayside	121,113	6,225	5·42
Western Isles	6,448	539	9·12
Total	1,280,254	78,088
Average			6·51

Notes:

1. The figures are for allocations to health boards for recurrent expenditure commitments. In addition, £35 million was allocated to boards for their ordinary capital programmes in 1984-85, against £32 million in 1983-84—an increase of 9·4 per cent.

2. The figures for the 1984-85 allocations differ from those which I provided for the hon. Member on 19 March 1984 because they take account of the abolition of the national insurance surcharge in the 1984 Budget, and also of a contribution from the Contingency Reserve towards the excess costs of 1984 NHS pay settlements to be met by health boards.

Hospital Building Programme

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which hospital building programme schemes in Scotland are now in progress or will be instituted; and what are the allocations for 1984-85 and for 1985-86.

Mr. John MacKay: Under the centrally financed major programme for Health Service building in Scotland, schemes are currently under construction at:

Merchiston Hospital, Paisley
New Paisley District General Hospital
New Borders District General Hospital, Melrose
New Fife College of Nursing, Kirkcaldy
Stirling Royal Infirmary
Falkirk Royal Infirmary
New Forth Valley College of Nursing, Falkirk
Leverndale Hospital, Glasgow
Caithness Central Hospital, Wick
Inverness Central Hospital
Kirklands Hospital Phase IA, Bothwell
Western General Hospital, Edinburgh
New West Lothian District General Hospital Phase I, Livingston
Murray Royal Hospital, Perth

Planning and design work are underway on further schemes at:

Ayrshire Central Laundry, Irvine
Geriatric Unit, Annan
Bonnybridge Hospital
Ladysbridge Laundry, Banff
Glasgow Eastern District College of Nursing Rutherglen Hospital
Glasgow Eastern District Psychiatric Centre
Lennox Castle Hospital, Lennoxtown
Craig Dunain Hospital, Inverness
Kirklands Hospital Phase II, Bothwell
Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, Burns Unit
Princess Margaret Rose Hospital, Edinburgh, Spinal Paralysis Unit
City Hospital, Edinburgh, Central Pharmacy and Stores
South Lothian College of Nursing
West Lothian District General Hospital, Phase II, Livingston
Gilbert Bain Hospital, Lerwick
Perth Royal Infirmary

Details are not held centrally of the smaller schemes determined locally by individual health boards. These, together with expenditure on equipment and upgrading boards' capital stock, account for around half of total capital funding.

The amount available for capital expenditure by health boards in 1984-85 is £112·3 million. Provision for 1985-86 will be of the same order; I hope to announce details shortly.

NHS (Manpower)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new doctors, nurses and auxiliary staff have been employed by the National Health Service in Scotland since May 1979, giving separate figures for each category year by year, to date, indicating the net increase in numbers for each category since May 1979.

Mr. John MacKay: Figures for new doctors, nurses and auxiliary staff are not held centrally. the whole-time equivalent numbers of staff in post from 1979 to 1984 are as follows, with the net and percentage increases for each category:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984*	Increase	Percentage Increase
Medical staff in the hospital and community services	5,426·4	5,441·2	5,436·4	5,545·6	5,583·1	5,592·4	166·0	3·1

Resit Examinations

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether resit examinations in O-grade English and mathematics will be available in 1986.

Mr. Younger: I expect to make an announcement shortly.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Griffiths Report)

13. Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in implementing the Griffiths report's recommendations on the running of the National Health Service.

Mr. Fowler: I am pleased to report that health authorities are making good progress in making the changes envisaged in the Griffiths report.

Within my Department the health services supervisory board has been set up and the chairman of the NHS management board, Mr. Victor Paige, has recently been appointed. I shall be considering with Mr. Paige what further changes are required.

Falklands Veterans (Benefits)

14. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply, 27 November, Official Report, column 770, what is the precise nature of the action which his Department has taken to ensure that benefits available to service men as a result of the Falklands war are well known.

Mr. Whitney: Standing arrangements with the Ministry of Defence ensure that every service man and woman is informed about war pensions and social security benefits on leaving the forces. Entitlement to war disablement pension is considered automatically when anyone is medically discharged. For those discharged as a result of the Falklands conflict, special arrangements were also made for a war pensioners' welfare officer to visit and advise them.

Southend Health Authority

16. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the extent to which the Southend health authority is underfunded compared with other areas in the north-east Thames region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: None. The allocation of resources to Southend district health authority is a matter for North East Thames regional health authority. The Region's Strategic Plan projects that Southend will be brought within one per cent. of its target by 1993-94. I will be pleased to meet, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend East and my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir Bernard Braine) as requested by them in order to discuss the position of the Authority.

General Practitioners (Lists)

17. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the reduction in the average list size of general practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Average list sizes have fallen between 1974 and 1983 from 2,384 to 2,155. We regard the average as of less significance than the extremes of the range. We are encouraged that the number of doctors with lists in excess of 3,000 patients has fallen in each of the past three years.

Cervical Cancer Screening

18. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects every health district or family practitioner committee in England and Wales to have an operational computerised system of call and recall for cervical cancer screening.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: An effective cervical cytology programme is not dependent on a computerised system of call and recall. Health authorities have been asked to ensure that every woman who has a smear test is recalled at five-yearly intervals when she enters the priority group. The method of organising a satisfactory recall system is for each health authority to determine in the light of local circumstances. We have not asked health authorities to implement call systems but we are funding a research project to evaluate the effectiveness of a cervical cytology screening call system. Many health authorities utilise FPCs to operate their recall schemes. A significant number of FPCs either use or are developing computerised systems.

Health Districts (Resources)

19. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has for the distribution of resources to poorer health districts.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for regional health authorities to allocate funds to health districts. In doing so, we expect them to have regard to the principles set out in the report of the resource allocation working party and also to take account of relevant local circumstances.

Footwear Costs

20. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research his Department has done on the effect on the health of chidren's feet of the cost of footwear.

Mr. John Patten: None.

Health Care

21. Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the extent of co-operation between the private and public sectors in the provision of health care.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The increasing interest shown by both sectors in a whole range of co-operative ventures is encouraging, and news of successful arrangements is always welcome. But there is scope for greater collaboration. Health authorities should make increased use of private sector facilities for the treatment of NHS patients wherever this is a cost effective way of improving or extending the service they can provide.

Diabetic Patients (Syringes)

22. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates to be the difference in cost between supplying a diabetic patient with glass syringes and supplying such a patient with disposable syringes.

Mr. John Patten: The cost to the NHS of the reusable glass insulin syringes, reusable needles and syringe carrying cases supplied on prescription is approximately £4.45* a year for each insulin-dependent diabetic patient in England.

The cost of supplying single-use (disposable) syringes and needles on prescription would be about £62 a year for a diabetic patient injecting twice a day and using the equipment once only as intended.

* Derived from 1983 prescribing figures at 1985 prices.

Wrightington Hospital, Lancashire

23. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to make a statement about the proposed closure of the children's ward at Wrightington hospital, Lancashire.

Mr. John Patten: The position is as I informed my hon. Friend on 27 November 1984 at columns 773-74.

Perinatal Mortality

24. Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reduction there has been in perinatal mortality over the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: The information is as follows:

Perinatal mortality: number, rates and percentage decrease from 1979 rate, 1979 to 1983 England and Wales

Year	Number	*Rate	Per cent decrease from 1979 rate
1979	9,432	14·7	—
1980	8,815	13·3	9·5
1981	7,563	11·8	19·7
1982	7,087	11·3	23·1
1983	6,582	10·4	29·3

Limited List Prescribing

25. Mr. Robert McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if discussions with the British Medical Association on the list of drugs which it is proposed to remove from National Health Service prescription are continuing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The British Medical Association and its General Medical Services Committee have had meetings with my right hon. Friend and myself to discuss the principle of the limited list proposals and I anticipate at least one further meeting.

However, the Association has so far refused our repeated offers to talk about the content of the limited list of less important drugs to be available under the NHS from 1 April. We very much regret its attitude, which cannot be in the best interests of patients. We also deplore their encouragement of some doctors who are alarming their patients with statements about the consequences of introducing such a list which are, in our opinion, unfounded and misleading. I am glad to say, however, that many individual doctors reject the BMA's claim to speak on their behalf on this issue and are giving us helpful advice and comments on our limited list proposals.

29. Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he took from outside the United Kingdom in formulating his proposals for a limited list of medicines.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 30 November 1984, at column 318, to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris).

32. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received during the past two months concerning the Government's proposals for generic prescribing of medicines.

35. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received regarding his proposals to introduce generic prescribing by general practitioners.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) earlier today.

Retirement Pensioners

26. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of retirement pensioners in the United Kingdom for 1970 and for the latest year available; and what was the total amount paid in retirement pensions in both years.

Mr. Whitney: In 1970 there were 7,531,000 retirement pensioners resident in the United Kingdom. In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, there were 9,223,000. The total amount paid in retirement pension in the financial year 1970-71 was £1,824 million and in the financial year 1983-84 £14,976 million. These costs include pensions paid to United Kingdom pensioners resident abroad.

Phenylketonuria

27. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average cost of testing for phenylketonuria for each newborn baby; and what was the total cost for 1983-84 for the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the average and total cost of these tests is not available centrally.

Elderly Persons (Home Visits)

28. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the increase in the number of elderly people treated by district nurses or visited by health visitors in their homes.

Mr. John Patten: The total number of persons aged 65 and over in England who were visited at home by district nurses increased by 22 per cent. between 1978 and 1983. If visits to residential homes are included the corresponding increase is 24 per cent. Over the same period visits by health visitors to persons aged 65 and over decreased by 10 per cent. This decline has been largely arrested since 1981 and this reflects the growing recognition by health authorities of the needs of elderly people living in the community.

Wandsworth Health Authority

30. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met the Chairman of the Wandsworth health authority; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I met the chairman of the Wandsworth health authority on 21 July 1983. The main subjects discussed at that meeting were resource allocations and planned changes in services. My noble Friend also attended a meeting of district chairmen in South-West Thames on 7 October 1983 at which the chairman of Wandsworth health authority was present. Apart from these formal meetings, I have also met Mr. Dougherty on other occasions when he and I were both present but we have not discussed health authority matters on those occasions.

Benefits (Take-up)

31. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current level of take-up of means-tested social security benefits.

Mr. Whitney: The latest estimates in Great Britain indicate that the level of take-up of supplementary benefit was 71 per cent. in 1981, and that for family income supplement it was about 50 per cent. in 1981-82. Among eligible supplementary benefit and family income supplement recipients take-up of free welfare foods in 1981 was estimated to be nearly 100 per cent. and among other eligible families about 7 per cent.

No information is available yet on take-up of housing benefits. The latest estimates of take-up of rent and rate rebates and rent allowances relate to England and Wales in 1982 when an estimated 72 per cent. of households took up entitlement to rent rebates, 65 per cent. took up rate rebates and 62 per cent. rent allowances.

No other estimates of take-up of means-tested social security benefits are available.

Addenbrookes Hospital

33. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has had communications with the Cambridge health authority about the award of the domestic services contract at Addenbrookes hospital.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our officials made inquiries, on my behalf, of the district health authority to seek its reasons for not accepting the lowest tender it had received. We were satisfied that the district considered it had good grounds for its choice and made no further intervention.

Since then, our officials have been in regular communication with officers of the Cambridge health authority. Our main concern has been to ensure that the industrial action taken by trade union members has not adversely affected patient care. I am pleased to report that patient services have continued uninterrupted during the period of industrial action and that the savings resulting from the letting of this contract have been directly channelled into patient care on the Addenbrooke's site.

My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has also been in touch with the district health authority chairman to see how the contract has been progressing and how services have been affected by the industrial action.

Nurses and Midwives

34. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nurses and midwives were employed in the National Health Service at the most recent count; and what was the comparable figure in 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The provisional total number of nursing and midwifery staff — including learners and unqualified staff but excluding agency staff — in the NHS in England at 30 September 1984 was 393,800 in whole-time equivalent terms compared with 347,500 at 30 September 1978.

The figures are not strictly comparable due to the change in the working week during the period from 40 hours in 1978 to 37½ hours by 1981.

Mentally Handicapped Children

36. Mr. Galley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is able to report on the progress being made to move mentally handicapped children out of long-stay hospitals.

Mr. John Patten: Projects so far approved and financed through the £1 million allocated to the pound for pound scheme and the £9 million schemes—described in my answer to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 25 October, at column 721—will bring over 300 children out of mental handicap hospitals. Mental handicap hospitals and units are not classified by the length of time patients stay. The number of children under 16 resident in all mental handicap hospitals and units in England has fallen from 7,100 in 1969 to about 1,270 at the end of 1983. These figures include children who are not normally resident but are receiving short periods of assessment or care, and also children in NHS community-based units. We would expect the numbers to continue to fall.

Death Certificates (Smoking)

37. Sir John Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why smoking is not listed as one of the recognised underlying causes of death for purposes of completing death certificates when ailments caused by smoking are among the recognised immediate causes of death.

Mr. John Patten: There is no official list of recognised underlying causes of death, and a certifying doctor may enter smoking as an underlying cause if he wishes. It must, of course, be borne in mind that although studies on groups of subjects indicate a causal relationship between smoking and certain diseases, this does not mean that when an individual smoker dies from one of these diseases, the smoking was necessarily the underlying cause of the disease.

Sick Pay

38. Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many appeals against refusal to pay statutory sick pay have been received by his Department; and how many have not yet been dealt with.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that because of the dispute at Newcastle central office information about appeals to social security tribunals connected with statutory sick pay is not yet available. The information should be available by the middle of this year.

Day Nurseries

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many day nurseries there are in England and Wales; and how many were built in the period 1983 to the latest date available.

Mr. John Patten: There were 1,514 day nurseries in England at 31 March 1984. This includes 72 nurseries opened since March 1983. These figures are provisional.

Stillbirths and Perinatal Infant Deaths

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the rates for stillbirths and perinatal and infant deaths amongst ethnic minority communities in the United Kingdom in each single year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: Figures for the United Kingdom are not collected. The available figures for England and Wales are shown in the table; they relate to the country of birth of the mother, and therefore not necessarily to her ethnic group.

Rates for stillbirths, perinatal and infant mortality by country of birth of mother 1979 to 1983*

Visual Display Units

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set up and finance an independent inquiry into the possible ill effects of working visual display units on all stages of pregnancy.

Mr. John Patten: No. An international conference held in London on 29-30 November 1984 on allegations of reproductive hazards from visual display units concluded that there was no evidence to suggest that any hazards existed. Research, however, continues and is reviewed regularly by both the Health and Safety Executive and this Department.

Dental Estimates Board (Appeals)

Mr. Penhaligon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will initiate an investigation into the causes of the sudden increase in Dental Estimates Board appeals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Seventy per cent. of the appeals received since January 1984 were against decisions of the Dental Estimates Board that complex and expensive bridge treatment proposed by the dentist was not clinically necessary to secure the dental fitness required by regulations. Because of our concern about the extent of unnecessary treatment, I announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox), at column 217, a committee of inquiry with wide terms of reference to look into this matter.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the increase in National Health Service expenditure in Great Britain between 1978-79 and 1984-85 on drugs, family practitioner services, and labour costs, respectively; and how this increase compares with inflation over the same period.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Over the period between 1978-79 and 1984-85 it is expected that cash expenditure in Great Britain on drugs and family practitioner services (excluding drugs) will have increased by 13 and 16 per cent. per year respectively. Over the same period it is estimated that expenditure in Great Britain on hospital and community health services staff (and agency staff) will have grown by about 12·5 per cent. per year. It is expected that the inflation rate, as measured by the GDP deflator, will have averaged 10 per cent. per year over the same period.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what main components of the National Health Service expenditure in Great Britain have increased by more than the rate of inflation between 1978-79 and 1984-85.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: All the main components of expenditure on the National Health Service in Great Britain have increased by more than the general rate of inflation between 1978-79 and 1984-85. Over the period, cash spending on hospital and community health services has increased by nearly 13 per cent. per year; cash spending on family practitioner services and centrally financed services has increased by 14·5 and 15·5 per cent. per year respectively. Capital spending has increased by 13 per cent. per year. Inflation, as measured by the growth of the GDP deflator, has averaged 10 per cent. per year over the same period.

Intravenous Fluids

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many manufacturers supplied one litre bottles of sterile water for irrigation to the National Health Service during each of the years 1975 to 1984 inclusive;

(2) what has been the average price paid by the National Health Service for a one litre bottle of sterile water for irrigation for each of the years 1975 to 1984 inclusive;

(3) what has been the average price paid by the National Health Service for a 500ml bag of dextrose injection 5 per cent. for each of the years from 1975 to 1984 inclusive.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Arrangements for the supply of intravenous fluids are made on a regional basis by health authorities and we do not collect detailed local information centrally. The Health Service Supply Council issued guidance to authorities on these supply arrangements in 1983 and the council will be revising this guidance in the light of inquiries it is carrying out into current market conditions.

National Insurance Contributions

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the national insurance contribution goes towards pensions and national health insurance; and what is the balance in each case which has to be made from general taxation.

Mr. Whitney: The national insurance scheme is financed on a pay-as-you-go basis with the aim of achieving a broad balance between income and expenditure. Contributions are not allocated to specific benefits, but an approximate notional apportionment can be made. The proportion would be the same for all benefits paid from the NI fund.

For 1984-85 the figures are expected to be:

	NI fund (per cent.)	General taxation (per cent.)
Retirement Pension	90	10
National Health Service	11	*86

* The remaining 3 per cent. is met by charges.

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the total cost of eliminating class 4 national insurance contributions.

Mr. Whitney: The estimated income to the national insurance fund from class 4 contributions in respect of 1984-85 is £280 million. Contributions are set so as to keep income in line with expenditure from the fund, so that if class 4 contributions were eliminated it might be necessary to make up the loss of increases elsewhere.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the most recent figures for the number of families claiming family income supplement and (b) the latest estimate of the proportion of families eligible who claim family income supplement.

Mr. Whitney: At the end of September 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, 207,000 families were receiving family income supplement. The latest estimate of the proportion of eligible families who take up FIS is derived from the 1981 and 1982 family expenditure surveys data and there is nothing I can add to the reply by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) on 12 June 1984, at column 460.

Undergraduates (Dependants Additions)

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many undergraduates are in receipt of dependants additions from his Department's hardship scheme in Blackpool to supplement their mandatory awards from their local education authorities.

Mr. Whitney: The hardship scheme of the Department of Education and Science, which is administered by this Department, is currently awarding dependants' allowances to 950 undergraduates in England and Wales and to 119 in Scotland.

Veterinary Waste Disposal

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to ensure that all general veterinary practices are equipped with incinerators for the purpose of clinical waste disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend has no power to make any such prescription. Control over clinical and other waste disposal in England is primarily the function of county councils as waste disposal authorities. It is a matter for individual veterinary surgeons to make satisfactory arrangements for disposal of their waste, subject to this control.

Dentists (Fraudulent Claims)

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, in the light of the recent report from the National Audit Office on the weakness of the special investigation unit of the Dental Estimates Board, he will reconsider the request from the British Dental Association for extra staff to investigate fraudulent National Health Service claims by dentists.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Changes in the procedures of the special investigation unit of the Dental Estimates Board were introduced following a report by the statutory auditors.

The British Dental Association has recently asked for an increase in the number of dental officers employed by our Department who are primarily concerned about the quality of treatment provided by dentists. We are satisfied, however, that the present number is sufficient to provide reasonable checks and we do not believe that increasing the numbers would make any significant contribution to reducing the level of undiscovered fraud.

Striking Miners (Benefits)

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether, pursuant to his answer of 20 December 1984, Official Report, column 314, unmarried miners on strike and living with their parents will be entitled to claim retrospectively under the housing benefits regulations for payment in respect of board and lodging for the period from the beginning of the strike up to 19 December 1984.

Mr. Newton: No. There is no provision in the Housing Benefits Regulations for claims to be backdated.

Cervical Cancer Screening

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied with the provision for cervical cancer screening in Birmingham.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Health authorities are responsible for operating the cervical screening programme within their own districts. If the hon. Member is concerned about the local service in Birmingham she should first of all take it up with the district or districts concerned.

Family Practitioners (Computers)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether resources will be made available for the implementation of the Arthur Anderson strategy for using computers in family practitioners services' administration.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. £2·2 million has been allocated for 1985-86, and we hope to make a good start on strategy implementation in order to improve administrative efficiency in the family practitioner services and give a better base for improvements in patient care.

Early priorities will include work on a new integrated computer system for patient registration; and on systems to enable the Dental Estimates Board to deal more quickly and economically with claims for payment.

We also hope to develop experimental links between pharmacy computers and the Prescription Pricing Authority.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Tax Allowances and Child Benefit

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much personal tax allowances and child benefit could be increased with a fiscal adjustment of (a) £1·5 billion and (b) £2 billion, if the same percentage increase were applied to personal tax allowances and child benefit; and if he will compare the consequent increase in net income for a two-child family on (i) half average earnings, (ii) three-quarters average earnings, (iii) average earnings, (iv) one and half average earnings and (v) twice average earnings with the increase in net income for these groups if the whole of the two sums were used to increase personal allowances.

Mr. Moore: Information based on full year direct revenue or expenditure costs at forecast 1985-86 levels is in the table. The income tax calculations assume that all the main personal allowances would be increased by the same percentage.

Full year cost £ billion		Increase in		Increase in net income married man with two children multiple of average earnings
		Married allowance £	Child Benefit pence per week	½-1½ £ per week	2 £ per week
1½	Same percentage increase (6½ per cent.)	200	45	2·05	2·44
	Allowances only increased (8 per cent.)	250	—	1·44	1·92
2	Same percentage increase (8¾ per cent.)	270	60	2·76	3·28
	Allowances only increased (10½ per cent.)	330	—	1·90	2·54

Workplace Nurseries

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if there has been any change in the practice of the Inland Revenue with regard to the treatment as a taxable benefit of the provision of a workplace nursery; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the decision to charge tax on employees' workplace nursery benefits resulted from a direction mentioning nurseries from the Board of the Inland Revenue;

(3) how much tax, including backdated payments, he expects to be collected by the taxation of employees on the benefits of a workplace nursery in the current financial year.

Mr. Moore: There has been no change in the practice of the Inland Revenue in relation to the tax treatment of the benefit of employer subsidised nurseries. Such benefits have been taxable in the hands of directors and certain employees (currently those earning at a rate of £8,500 a year or more) since legislation was first introduced by the Labour Government in 1948. I regret that a firm estimate of the tax yield from this particular benefit cannot be made.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if it is the intention of the Inland Revenue to claim arrears of tax from users of its own former staff nursery;

(2) how many staff of the Inland Revenue who used the Inland Revenue staff nursery during its existence are now liable to pay backdated tax on that benefit.

Mr. Moore: The relevant tax rules apply to directors and "higher paid" employees: they apply to civil servants as to other employees and were applied throughout the period that the Inland Revenue staff nursery was in existence.

Economic Competitiveness

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria he uses to assess the international competitiveness of the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: Broadly interpreted, "international competitiveness" refers to the ability of a country's producers to compete successfully both in world markets and in its own domestic market. As such it goes beyond the narrower concept of price or cost competitiveness, to encompass such "non-price" factors as quality and design, delivery, and after-sales service. A range of criteria has to be used. The problems which arise in measuring and assessing competitiveness were discussed in the July 1983 issue of the economic progress report.

Gross National Product

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his objective for the proportions of the gross national product which should be (a) saved and (b) devoted to capital expenditure; and what are the current proportions.

Mr. Peter Rees: During the 12 months ending in June 1984, gross saving amounted to 20·2 per cent. and gross domestic fixed capital formation to 16·9 per cent. of the gross national product. The Government do not have explicit objectives for these proportions, but their policies are designed to secure sustained economic growth and thus higher rates of saving and investment.

Customs and Excise (Imported Books)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many person hours have been spent to date by Customs and Excise officials in investigating the importation of books by Lavender Menace, Balham Book and Food Co-operative, and Gay's the Word Bookshop, respectively.

Mr. Hayhoe: Records of staff time are not kept in sufficient detail to provide this information.

Gay's the Word Bookshop

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many staff are currently engaged in work relating to the prosecution of Gay's the Word bookshop and its directors; and what has been the cost to the taxpayer to date of all work connected with the prosecution.

Mr. Hayhoe: A small proportion of the time of four Customs and Excise officials is currently devoted to work relating to the prosecution of Gay's the Word bookshop and its directors. Records of staff time are not maintained in the degree of detail necessary to answer the second part of this question.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire on 11 December, Official Report, column 455, if he will outline his plans for contesting the reasoned opinion under article 169 of the treaty of Rome alleging that certain aspects of the value added tax zero rates enforced in the United Kingdom including those applicable to non-domestic construction work are contrary to the provisions of the sixth value added tax directive.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government have applied to the reasoned opinion and, as I said in my answer to my hon. Friend on 11 December, at column 455, have made it clear that they do not accept the Commission's views. It is now for the Commission to decide in the light of the United Kingdom reply whether to make an application for a case to be heard before the European Court.

Wages

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect of a fall in the real level of United Kingdom wages on domestic demand.

Mr. Peter Rees: The size of the effect of a fall in real wages on domestic demand will depend on a number of factors, including the macroeconomic policy stance. The evidence suggests that domestic demand will increase, after the first year, in percentage terms by between 0·1 per cent. and 0·5 per cent. for every 1 per cent. sustained fall in the average level of real wages brought about by a fall in nominal wages.

Prohibited Drugs

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the quantity of illegally imported class A prohibited drugs seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in each of the years 1981 to 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: The quantities of illegally imported class A prohibited drugs seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in each of the years 1981 to 1983 are set out in the following table. The figures for 1984 are not yet available; I shall write to the hon. and learned Member when they are.

	1981	1982	1983
Heroin	87·160 kgs	183·244 kgs	212·463 kgs
Cocaine	13·597 kgs	12·117 kgs	73·326 kgs
Morphine	5·903kgs	2·199 kgs	0·525 kgs
	+ 10,000 tablets	+ 76 tablets	+ 12 doses
LSD	0·001 kgs	0·001 kgs	0·009 kgs
	+ 1,013 doses	+ 17,540 doses	+ 7,305 doses
Opium	9·920 kgs	18·562 kgs	2·887 kgs
	+ 72 tablets		+ 23 doses
Liquid cannabis	73·468 kgs	28·492 kgs	20·181 kgs

International Monetary Fund

Dame Judith Hart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the criteria of the board of the International Monetary Fund for admission to membership, or continued membership, of the fund.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the right hon. Member to the International Monetary Fund's articles of agreement, a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Adult Education (VAT)

Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what sources of advice from his Department are available to local education authorities concerning the question of liability of adult education classes to value added tax;

(2) whether he is satisfied that the liability of adult education classes for value added tax is being applied evenly among local education authorities; and what evidence he has of any anomalies in the application of the liability;

(3) what representations he has received concerning the liability to value added tax of adult education courses;

(4) whether he will list the adult education courses on which value added tax has been charged for the first time since 1984;

(5) what discussions have been held between officials of his Department and the local education authorities regarding the liability to value added tax of adult education courses;

(6) whether he will make a statement on the current situation regarding the liability to value added tax of adult education courses.

Mr. Hayhoe: The liability to tax of adult education classes provided by local authorities depends on the content of individual courses and the level at which fees are charged. No information is held centrally giving details of adult education courses which have recently been charged to tax for the first time.

There has been no recent change in the law concerning VAT and adult education or in its interpretation by Customs and Excise. But changing financial arrangements by local authorities were recognised to have affected the VAT treatment of some adult education courses and to clarify the position Customs and Excise held detailed discussions with the local authority associations last year. As a result a jointly agreed document was produced giving guidance on how courses were to be treated for VAT from 1 September 1984 and this advice was issued to all local authorities. In addition, Customs and Excise officers visited all local authorities providing adult education to ensure that they fully understand the guidelines and are therefore able to arrange their courses so as to gain the maximum possible benefit from the existing provisions for relief from the tax.

Since the implementation of the guidelines Treasury Ministers have received 25 representations concerning the tax treatment of adult education courses. Customs and Excise has had few anomalies brought to its attention by local authorities or the local authority associations which are keeping a watching brief on the operation of the guidelines in practice. It is open to any local authority to seek further advice on liability from its local VAT office.

£1 Coin

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many £1 coins are now in circulation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 14 January, at column 43, to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

Married Man's Allowance

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many couples claimed the married man's allowance in each of the last five fiscal years for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Budget Consultations

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which organisations or associations are customarily received by Treasury Ministers before the annual Budget is put to Parliament; and what criteria he uses in deciding whether such groups should be received by him personally or by other Ministers in his Department.

Mr. Moore: Treasury Ministers receive a great many requests from representative bodies for meetings prior to each year's Budget. It is not possible to see them all. The general practice is to meet a small number of organisations representing a large number of people every year and to see other organisations less frequently. However, every Budget representation received by Treasury Ministers is carefully considered. The choice of Treasury Minister or Ministers for receiving delegations depends upon a number of factors, including the availability of Ministers and the nature of the representations.

EC (Contributions)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the net amount to be contributed by the United Kingdom to the Common Market in 1985 and 1986 will compare with the net amount contributed in 1984 on the assumption that the resources of the EEC are increased in accordance with the Council of Ministers recommendation.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 11 January 1985, c. 563]: Estimates of our net payments to European Community institutions in 1984-85 and later years will be published in the next public expenditure White Paper.

Heroin

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the kilogram quantities of heroin which have been seized by Customs and Excise officers in each year since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 43]: The kilogram quantities of heroin which have been seized by Customs and Excise officers in each of the years 1979 to 1983 are set out in the following table. The figures for 1984 are not yet available; I shall write to the hon. Member when they are.

Year	Kilograms
1980	38
1981	87
1982	183
1983	212

European Community (Budget)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the increase in the gross contributions to the Common Market which the United Kingdom will be required to make in the event of the resources of that body being increased along the lines proposed by the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 43]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 11 July 1984 at column 444.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 16 January 1985

PRIME MINISTER

Naval Signals (Retention)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government regarding the periods of time for which different categories of naval signals are retained, set out by security classification and by source.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) on 27 November 1984, at columns 412-13.

Petitions

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister what is the Government's policy as to the making under Standing Order No. 122 of observations by Ministers on public petitions.

The Prime Minister: There is no procedural obligation on Ministers to make observations on public petitions. But they may do so if they consider that such action is appropriate taking account, for example, of the degree of public support and the previous consideration of the issue concerned.

Argentina (Rearmament)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what assessment she has made of Argentine rearmament following the Falklands war; and what are the implications of such a rearmament on (a) the cost of maintaining a British garrison on the Falkland Islands and (b) the feasibility of defending the islands against attack.

The Prime Minister: We are aware that Argentina is modernising her forces mainly under contracts negotiated before the Falklands conflict. It would not be in the public interest to comment on our assessment of Argentine arms purchases and capabilities. We stand by our commitment to the Falkland Islands, and we will maintain a garrison there at the minimum size necessary to defend them. Our existing estimates of Falkland garrison costs take account of our assessment of Argentine capabilities and the forces necessary to defend the islands; our ability to reinforce the islands will be very greatly enhanced by the Mount Pleasant airfield.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what information she has on (a) the supply of weapons manufactured in the United Kingdom and (b) the use of subcontractors in the United Kingdom to supply weapons manufactured outside the United Kingdom to Argentina.

The Prime Minister: There has been an embargo on the sale of arms to Argentina since the beginning of 1982.

Under the terms of contracts signed well before the Falklands conflict, a number of British companies have supplied equipment to West Germany over the past two years for incorporation in warships being built for Argentina.

The Government require end user certificates only for complete equipments. It is not practical to insist on these for minor components supplied to overseas prime contractors under collaborative agreements.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister what steps she has taken to ensure that no British weapons or parts are supplied to the Argentine Government.

The Prime Minister: The export of defence and defence related equipment is controlled by the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1981 and export licences are required.

Since the beginning of April 1982 there has been an embargo on the export of such equipment to Argentina. This embargo remains in force.

Council of Europe

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister what changes have been made in the composition of the United Kingdom delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

The Prime Minister: I have appointed the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) a Substitute Member in place of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Thorne).

Tax Evasion

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will take steps to ensure that no company with a Government majority shareholding establishes or uses any facilities in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man for the purposes of avoiding United Kingdom tax.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Sonic Sounds Audio Holdings plc

Mr. Hugh Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what conclusions he has reached on the need for an official investigation into the collapse of Sonic Sounds Audio Holdings plc following the representations of the hon. Member for Harrow, East.

Mr. Fletcher: Sonic Sounds Audio Holdings plc was wound up compulsorily by the High Court on 13 December 1982. Its affairs are subject to investigation by the Official Receiver, who is working closely with the receiver appointed by the debenture holder bank and the liquidator appointed by the court. It will be for them to consider whether there is any sufficient evidence to warrant further proceedings.

Clothing, Footwear and Textile Industries

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to increase Government investment in the British clothing, footwear and textile industries.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total value of imports of textiles, clothing and footwear into the United Kingdom from China in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Channon: The information is as follows:

	Value £ million (cif)
1975	10·5
1976	14·2
1977	19·1
1978	25·8
1979	28·3
1980	31·2
1981	42·9
1982	49·0
January-October 1984	64·2

Source: data corresponding to: SITC/R2 Divisions 65, 84 (less Group 848) and 85 (less Item 851.05), Groups 266 and 267 and Sub-group 268.7 (part): and SITC/R1 Divisions 65 and 85 (less Item 851.05), Group 266, and Sub-groups 262.8, 841.1, 841.2 and 841.4.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he has given to the effect that abandoning the multi-fibre arrangement would have on developing countries.

Mr. Channon: Any renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement would need to be negotiated with the developing countries concerned. The group of developing countries co-operating over these matters have published views in a document "The MFA in Theory and Practice". I am arranging for a copy of this document to be placed in the Library. The effect of the MFA on developing countries is also included in the report of the GATT secretariat "Textiles and Clothing in the World Economy", a copy of which is already in the Library.

Textile Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will list in the Official Report all those organisations or individuals who have expressed to him opposition to the possible implementation of the proposals of the Silberston report on competition in the United Kingdom textile industry;

(2) what representations he has received concerning the Silberston report on competition in the United Kingdom textile industry;

(3) whether he has any intention of implementing the proposals of the Silberston report on competition in the United Kingdom textile industry.

Mr. Channon: Professor Silberston was asked to make an independent study of the implications for the United Kingdom economy at large, and for the industries concerned in particular, of international trading policies affecting textiles and clothing. The Government will develop their own proposals, but before that will consult all the main interested parties concerned. Representations on the Silberston report have been received from various parties, including the British Clothing Industries Association, the British Textile Confederation, the Knitting Industries Federation and the Consumers' Association.

Small Business Policy

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are his principal objectives in small business policy for 1985.

Mr. Trippier: The Government's overall objectives in small firms policy in 1985 continue to be the stimulation of the growth of small businesses and self-employment and as a better understanding of their role in the community. Within these overall objectives we intend to:

—review the impact and effectiveness of the new loan guarantee scheme and encourage use of the business expansion scheme, so that the flow of finance to small firms is improved, — sponsor seminars for professional advisers on business planning for small firms,

— encourage co-operation between the various small firms advisory agencies, stimulate the growth of local enterprise agencies and the contribution of the private sector, promote the facilities that the small firms service can offer to small businesses and complete computerisation of its inquiry service,

—hold a further local enterprise week in May to publicise the wide range of locally based assistance which is available to small firms, —continue to remedy disadvantages suffered by small firms arising directly from their size,

— work with MSC in developing appropriate and accessible training facilities for those starting and running small firms, and in May to launch a video encouraging owner-managers of small firms to undertake relevant management training.

In addition, the work of Lord Young's enterprise unit, which has a bearing on small firms policy and the scrutiny report on administrative and legislative burdens, will be considered during 1985.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the main achievements of small business policy in 1984.

Mr. Trippier: During 1984 the Government continued to foster conditions favouring the setting up and growth of small businesses, the total number of which had in 1980 to 1983 increased by more than 110,000. The more important achievements included:

— continuing development of the small firms service which handled 279,000 inquiries and new 23,000 counselling cases, — encouragement of the growth of local enterprise agencies, which now number 233 with 35 being formed,

—the first local enterprise week was held on 17 to 22 June to encourage those offering help to small businesses to promote their work at local level,

— the enterprise allowance scheme operated by the Manpower Services Commission was extended and helped 42,000 unemployed people to start new businesses,

—the loan guarantee scheme was extended following the pilot phase until the end of 1985,

—equity investment in small companies was encouraged through the business expansion scheme, under which more than 10,000 investors put at least £75 million into 400 small companies in 1983-84,

— a nationwide series of seminars for professional advisers to increase their awareness of the problems of small firms finance, and Government schemes of assistance.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what share of British visible export trade, excluding diamonds, was accounted for by the top 30, 75 and 220 companies in 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively;

(2) how many companies represented the top 40 per cent., 50 per cent. and 66 per cent. of United Kingdom visible export trade in 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Channon: Such information as is available is published in British Business, 27 May 1983, p. 366, a copy of which is in the Library. For the reasons given in the article, the analysis of this data has been discontinued.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many youth training scheme places were unfilled in Waltham Forest at the latest date for which figures are available; and what proportion of total places this figure represents.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 8 January there were 781 approved places on the youth training scheme in the London borough of Waltham Forest, 365 of which were unfilled. However, a number of places have only recently been approved and recruitment to these has either not begun or has started only recently.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of youth training scheme sponsors' staff and managing agents' staff had training at accredited training centres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information is not available in the precise form requested. From 1 April 1984 to 30 September 1984, a total of 51,463 people received training through accredited centres. The numbers are made up as follows.

		Per cent.
Youth Training Scheme Mode A staff	20,262	39·4
Youth Training Scheme Mode B staff	20,130	39·1
Non-Youth Training Scheme staff	11,661	21·5

In addition, managing agents and sponsors can and do make separate arrangements for staff training either through their own training facilities or by using external training agencies.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people in training on the youth training scheme are estimated to be employees (a) on current year schemes and (b) on previous year schemes; how these figures compare with the previous year; what growth in the number of employees was expected when planning 1984-85 places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 10 January 1985, c. 535]: It is necessary to distinguish between the number of jobs for 16-year-olds which are covered by the youth training scheme (but which may be filled by youngsters with either employee or trainee status) and the number of young people on the scheme who are actually given employee status.

In 1983-84 it is estimated that about 14,000 young people entered the youth training scheme as employees; more became employees during the course of the year, but the precise number is not known. Up to the end of November 1984, it is estimated that around 14,400 young people on 1984-85 schemes had joined as employees.

In planning for 1984-85, no estimate was made of the number of youngsters likely to join the youth training scheme with employee status. For planning purposes, it was estimated that the number of jobs for 16-year-olds which would be covered by the scheme (and which may be filled by either employees or trainees) would increase from the estimated 50,000 achieved in 1983-84 to about 115,000 in 1984-85. However, latest estimates suggest that in the event about 80,000 such jobs will be covered by the scheme in 1984-85.

Wage Movements

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how wages of males under 21 years of age have moved since 1979 in comparison to those of adult males; and what are the equivalent figures for females.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: According to the "New Earnings Survey", the percentage changes in average gross weekly earnings of full-time employees working a full week between April 1979 and April 1984 were as follows:

Age	Males	Females
Under 18	+57	+60
18 to 20 inclusive	+63	+69
21 and over	+79	+86

Adult Training Loans Scheme

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to allocate funds for the proposed pilot adult training loans scheme on a county-by-county basis according to the proportionate size of the local education budget.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Decisions about the proposed pilot scheme for training loans will not be taken until after the period for consultation ends on 31 January. We have noted our hon. Friend's suggestion and will give it due consideration.

Travel-to-work Areas

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether he will reconsider his designation of travel-to-work areas which receive regional assistance following the publication of the 1984 census of employment;

(2) whether he will seek to verify his travel-to-work area employment figures by commissioning a study of the up-to-date employment numbers in the Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy travel-to-work areas.

Mr. Alan Clark: The designation of assisted areas is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

The results of the 1984 census of employment, which are scheduled to become available in the autumn, will provide more up-to-date employment figures for travel-to-work areas including the Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy areas.

Industrial Hazards (Essex)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the installations classified as major industrial hazards in the United Kingdom are located in Essex; if he will name them; on what criteria such classification rests; and when it is intended to review the list.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are informed by the Health and Safety Commission that 43 installations in Essex had been notified to the Health and Safety Executive by 31 December 1984 under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982. Section 28 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act prevents the Health and Safety Executive from providing a list of names and locations, but the executive is prepared to discuss with any hon. Member informally the position in his or her constituency. The notified installations are defined on the basis of their potential to cause a major accident (which might also have effects off-site), in terms of substances, or groups of substances, and inventories. The list of installations is under continuous review.

Power Presses Regulations

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers have (a) been cautioned and (b) prosecuted, and with what result, for infringement of the Power Presses Regulations 1965 in Birmingham, Coventry, and elsewhere in the west midlands by the west midlands area of the Health and Safety Executive in each of the last five years to the nearest convenient date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Between 1981 and 1984 the number of improvement and prohibition notices served in the west midlands area in relation to power presses which are subject to the Power Presses Regulations 1965 are as follows:

	Notices
1981	2
1982	8
1983	14
1984	7

I regret that disaggregate figures for 1980 and figures for different districts within the west midlands are not available.

Between 1980 and 1984 there were 61 successful prosecutions for breaches of the Power Presses Regulations 1965 in the west midlands.

Table I
Prosecutions under the Power Presses Regulations 1965 (West Midlands Area)

	Birmingham	Coventry	Elsewhere in the West Midlands
1980	3 (5)	1 (1)	5 (5)
1981	4 (8)	—	1 (1)
1982	3 (4)	—	4 (4)
1983	11 (14)	—	10 (10)
1984	6 (7)	—	13 (13)

1981	1,150	—	200
1982	800	—	850
1984	1,650	—	4,750

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many inspections to check compliance with the Power Presses Regulations 1965 have been carried out by the factory inspectorate of the west midlands area of the Health and Safety Executive in each of the past five years to the nearest convenient date; and how many were carried out in (a) Birmingham, (b) Coventry and (c) elsewhere in the area.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Between 1981 and 1984 there were 6,721 visits to premises in the west midlands where the Power Presses Regulations applied. Figures are not available for 1980. Details are given in the following table. 2,342 of these visits were made to look generally at health and safety conditions and compliance with the regulations was checked. The purpose and nature of each visit varied for the remainder, but at some of them compliance with the regulations would have been examined. 21 complaints about the safety of power presses received during the period were all investigated.

Number of visits to premises where the Power Presses Regulations 1965 apply (West Midlands)

	Birmingham	Coventry	Elsewhere in the West Midlands
1981	632 (196)	58 (12)	887 (279)
1982	773 (282)	76 (39)	1013 (383)
1983	715 (243)	76 (30)	963 (341)
1984	545 ((199)	61 (19)	922 (319)

(Figures in brackets show the number of routine visits to look generally at health and safety conditions).

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the latest estimate of the number of (a) employers and (b) presses covered by the Power Presses Regulations 1965 in Birmingham, Coventry and elsewhere in the west midlands.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On 11 January 1985 the following number of premises where persons are employed were registered as having machines subject to the Power Presses Regulations 1965.

	Number
Birmingham	649
Coventry	68
Elsewhere in the west midlands	832

The number of presses covered by the regulations is not known.

Factory Inspectors

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what, in each of the last five years to the nearest convenient date, has been the number of full-time factory inspectors employed by the west midlands area of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The numbers are as follows:

	Number
1 January 1981	63
1 January 1982	60
1 January 1983	56
1 January 1984	52
1 January 1985	47

Books (Price)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the percentage increase in the retail price of books for (a) the last five years and (b) the last 10 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The retail prices index for books increased by 107 per cent. in the five years to November 1984 and by 349 per cent. in the 10 years to November 1984.

Wages Councils

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide figures for the number of establishments visited by wages council inspectors, the number of establishments found to be in violation of wages councils orders, the amount of money recovered for employees, the number of employers prosecuted and the number fined in (a) England, (b) the northern region and (c) the south Tyneside area, respectively, during 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures requested are not yet available for 1984.

Apprenticeship Training Schemes

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration he has given to ways of providing greater encouragement to industry to expand apprenticeship training schemes for young people with particular regard to high technology jobs; whether he has any proposals to put to Parliament on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 35]: The development of new technology gives rise to changed training needs for young people and adults alike. One of the main objectives of our adult training strategy is to secure an adequate supply of people with up-to-date skills to meet the demands of new technologies, upon which economic growth must be based. The primary responsibility for meeting skill needs rests with employers, who are best placed to determine their future skill requirements, including those for new technology. We have therefore recently launched a campaign to raise awareness among employers of the need for training and retraining.

With regard to young people, the Government continue to make support available through the youth training scheme, both for young people undertaking the first year of long-duration skill training including apprenticeships, and for information technology centres, which are making a positive contribution in equipping many young people with new technology skills.

TRANSPORT

Drivers' Vision Tests

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to alter the vision test for driving test candidates; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Both opthalmic research and accident studies suggest that the present number plate test constitutes a perfectly satisfactory standard of eyesight for driving. However, I shall be studying carefully the recommendation made by the Select Committee on Transport in this connection.

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek powers to require the marking of driving licences to signify that the holder should wear corrective lenses whilst driving.

Mrs. Chalker: I see no advantage in this.

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek powers to require driving licence holders to undergo periodic vision tests.

Mrs. Chalker: All licence holders already have a statutory responsibility to ensure that their eyesight meets the required standard. The fact that research by the TRRL has indicated that only between 1 per cent. and 3 per cent. of drivers would fail the number plate test suggests that the vast majority of drivers already comply with this requirement. However, I shall be studying carefully the recommendations made by the Select Committee on Transport in this connection.

Air Package Holidays

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has taken since publication of the report on the independent review by Sir Peter Lane into the present arrangements for protecting air package holidaymakers.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Action has already been taken on two of Sir Peter's main recommendations. We have undertaken to reimpose a levy on the holders of air travel organisers' licences should future claims arising from the failure of tour operators seriously reduce the size of the air travel reserve fund. The Civil Aviation Authority is also consulting on proposals to increase the level of bonds which must be provided by ATOL holders.

When he announced publication of the report my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport, invited the views of the travel and insurance industries. Comments have now been received from a number of interested parties. In addition, the chairman of the Air Travel Reserve Fund Agency has commissioned from Bowring UK Ltd an examination of the feasibility of an insurance based scheme for protecting the interests of those buying package holidays from air tour operators. Bowring's interim conclusions suggest that insurance may be a feasible option and they have now been asked to produce a final report. A decision on the future arrangements for protecting holidaymakers will be taken on the basis of this work, when it has been completed and of the other comments we have received.

I hope to announce the final decision before the summer.

Speed Limits

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider introducing a speed limit on single track roads in upland areas.

Mrs. Chalker: The national speed limit of 60mph applies to all single carriageway roads and I have no evidence that a lower national limit is needed on single track roads. Lower limits may be imposed locally where appropriate.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Dog Licences

36. Sir Hector Monro asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions have taken place for the failure to purchase a dog licence in the latest convenient year.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The most recent year for which figures are available is 1983 when there were 203 prosecutions.

Drugs (Offences)

Dr. Godman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of drug-related offences tried in (a) Scotland and (b) Greenock in the years 1978 to 1984.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Figures for the number of drug-related offences tried in Scotland and Inverclyde district, which includes Greenock, in the years 1978-1983 are given in the following table. Such information is not yet available for 1984.

Year	Scotland	Inverclyde
1978	1,144	7
1979	1,317	—
1980	1,386	17
1981	1,164	16
1982	1,627	23
1983	1,952	30

WALES

Fluoride Pollution

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, the publication date and availability of project C2 on fluoride pollution effects on north-east Anglesey, financed by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This research project by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology, Bangor, is ongoing, having commenced in 1971. Periodic progress reports have been published since the work started in 1971. Future data will also be published, although this is a matter for which the Natural Environment Research Council has the prime responsibility as the major contributor.

Infant Mortality Rate

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the infant mortality rate and the number of deaths of infants under one year of age for each area health authority in Wales for 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: For the 1983 information I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 15 May at column 103. The information for 1984 is not yet available.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births in Wales in 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: 10·7 in 1983. The information for 1984 is not yet available.

Sheep Dipping

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations have been received by his Department advocating an amendment to the regulations governing sheep scab control measures to enable sheep dipping to be varied in accordance with local sheep shearing practices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Representations were received from five organisations in Wales about the dates set in 1984 for compulsory dipping against sheep scab. I appreciate that difficulties arise when dipping dates do not coincide with local husbandry practices, but dipping periods which apply nationally are essential if the campaign to eradicate the disease is to succeed.

A-Level Mathematics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh pupils took A-level examinations in applied and specialist mathematics courses for each year from 1979-80 to 1983-84, inclusive; and how many are expected to do so in 1985.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The available information relates to candidates from maintained and independent schools, further education colleges and external candidates who sat Welsh Joint Education Committee A-level summer examinations. The number of entries is given in the following table.

Subject	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Applied Mathematics	227	197	189	195	198	150
Mathematics	1,950	2,207	2,460	2,743	2,867	2,876
Pure Mathematics	277	256	235	257	253	190
Further Mathematics, Statistics, Pure Mathematics and Statistics	20	13	20	14	25	9

Reliable estimates of the numbers of entries to WJEC A-level examinations in the above subjects for 1985 are not available.

Council House Waiting Lists

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many families in Wales are currently on council house waiting lists for each relevant local authority.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 4 July 1983, at column 16.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many youngsters on youth training schemes in Wales were injured at work in (a) 1983 and (b) 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am informed by the Manpower Services Commission that the information is as follows:

	Injuries
	Fatal	Major	Minor
(a) 1 April 1983 to 31 March 1984	—	5	68
(b) 1 April 1984 to 30 September 1984	—	11	91

Details for the quarter ending 31 December 1984 are not yet available.

MSC accident figures for the youth training scheme are compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive on employed persons. However, the figures quoted may include a number of accidents which did not occur "at work"; for example, road traffic accidents during scheme time and accidents to trainees in educational situations or establishments, which may not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.

Injuries are classified according to the severity criteria of the Notification of Accidents and Dangerous Occurences Regulations 1980.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the Wales labour force has been unemployed for (a) over three years, (b) over two years and (c) over one year; and if he will publish the actual numbers involved in each category.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Detailed information is not available in the form requested. Available figures are based on employee population. These relate to October 1984 when 24,993, or 2·3 per cent., 16,928, or 1·6 per cent., and 29,981, or 2·8 per cent., were out of work for over three years, two years and one year, respectively.

Job Creation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) manufacturing and (b) service jobs have been (i) created and (ii) lost to Wales in each year from 1978-79 to 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Net changes in levels of employment—excluding self employment—are indicated by the estimates of employees in employment compiled by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. These, for the years concerned and for the standard industrial classification concerned, are given in the following table:

Year (sic 1980)	Manufacturing		Service
June each year	Number of employees in employment	Change on previous year	Number of employees in employment	Change on previous year
1978	311,000	—	558,000	—
1979	312,000	+ 1,000	574,000	+16,000
1980	288,000	−24,000	573,000	− 1,000
1981	239,000	−49,000	564,000	− 9,000
1982	226,000	−13,000	560,000	− 4,000
1983	213,000	−13,000	572,000	+12,000
1984	212,000	− 1,000	581,000	+ 9,000

O-level Modern Languages

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh secondary school pupils took O-level examinations in (a) one modern language and (b) two modern languages for each of the years 1979-80 to 1983-84; and how many are expected to do so in June.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is not available centrally in the form requested. Details of the number of entries — including those from further education establishments and external candidates — by individual subject are, however, published annually by the Welsh Joint Education Committee in its report on the summer examinations.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sugar

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what have been the European Economic Community intervention price for sugar beet, the sugar price paid to ACP countries and the average world sugar price in each of the past five years.

Mr. MacGregor: There is no intervention price for sugar beet. The intervention price for raw sugar, the guaranteed price for raw sugar imported from ACP countries under preferential arrangements and the average London daily price for raw sugar have been as follows —on a July-June basis:

	*Intervention price for raw sugar £ per tonne	ACP guaranteed price for raw sugar†* £ per tonne	Average London daily price for raw sugar‡ £ per tonne
1979-80

† Supplies of preferential ACP sugar are marketed in the Community at prices freely negotiated between buyers and sellers. The Community guarantees to purchase, at the guaranteed price, quantities of white or raw sugar, within agreed quantities, which cannot be marketed in the Community at a price equivalent to or in excess of the guaranteed price.

‡ There is no single world price for sugar. The London daily price is representative of the prices on the world market.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting held in Brussels on 14-15 January.

Mr. Jopling: Together with my hon. Friend the Minister of State in my Department I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting.

The Commission proposed changes to the rules for milk quotas including one intended to meet my request for a provision allowing producers to exchange their direct sale and wholesale quotas. They also proposed, for 1984-85 only, that unused quota could be reallocated within a member state to producers, dairies or regions where deliveries exceed quotas. While reaffirming our commitment to an effective supplementary levy system, I gave a cautious welcome to these proposals which will now be examined in detail at official level.

On structures, the Italian presidency said that it would put forward a compromise covering all proposals on the table with a view to a decision being taken at the next meeting of the Council; I emphasised that any compromise must include satisfactory provisions on conservation.

Four measures were adopted providing for the same quantities of cattle and beef to be imported into the Community in 1985 on specially favourable terms as was permitted in 1984. This was a satisfactory outcome which will allow our processors and traders to secure beef of the qualities they need.

With three other colleagues I complained about the slow progress made by the Commission in dealing with the Dutch national aid on gas prices. The Commission undertook to expedite the matter.

The Council had a first discussion of the proposals designed to implement the agreement on wine reached at the European Council in December. It will return to this subject at its next meeting.

The next meeting of the Council is scheduled for 25-26 February.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falkland Islands

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are now any plans to discuss with Argentina the future of the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: No. But as I told my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on 12 December, at column 521, we remain ready to pursue practical ways of improving bilateral relations with Argentina.

Western European Union

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards reforms to the institutions and practices of the Western European Union which were outlined in Herr Genscher's address to the Western European Union Assembly on 29 October 1984.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 12 November, at column 151, in which I drew attention to our policy of full support for the reactivation and reform of WEU as agreed by Foreign and Defence Ministers at Rome on 27 October last year, and as subsequently reported by Herr Genscher to the WEU assembly in Paris.

Antarctica Treaty

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effect of the decision to transfer use of the Adelaide base in Antarctica to Chile on the Chilean position in the review of the Antarctica treaty in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Article IV of the Antarctica treaty states, inter alia, that "no acts or activities taking place while the present Treaty is in force shall constitute a basis for asserting, supporting or denying a claim to territorial sovereignty in Antarctica."

The arrangements made with Chile over the use of the Adelaide base thus have no legal effect on the sovereignty positions of either the United Kingdom or Chile in Antarctica and would have no direct bearing on any future review of the treaty.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why he did not announce his decision to hand over the use of the Adelaide base to Chile by means of an oral statement in the House.

Mr. Renton: Co-operation in both scientific and logistic activities is both regular and normal between Antarctic treaty consultative parties. There was, therefore, no requirement to inform the House of the new arrangements made for the use of the Adelaide station.

Mr. Mushtaq Hussein (Immigration)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will institute an urgent inquiry within his Department into the reasons for the delay of Her Majesty's embassy in Islamabad in deciding the application by Mushtaq Hussein of PO Syedwala District, Shiekupura, to join his wife, Mrs. Perveen Hussein of 55 Birch Lane, Longsight, Manchester 13, following his interview of 20 June 1984.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's embassy in Islamabad has advised that, as a result of inquiries made during the course of a field trip on 14 January to Mr. Hussein's village in the Sheikhupura area, he has been informed that a visa can be issued to him.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why consideration of the application by Mr. Mushtaq Hussein to come to the United Kingdom was delayed through the absence on holiday in Britain of the officer handling the case.

Mr. Renton: The entry clearance application was not delayed through the absence on holiday of any individual member of the immigration section staff of the embassy in Islamabad. When an officer goes on leave his outstanding work is reallocated to other members of the immigration section.

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will admit Mr. Mushtaq Hussein to the United Kingdom before 27 January.

Mr. Renton: Mr. Hussein was informed on 14 January that the issue of a visa has been approved and would be issued at his convenience.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Workplace Nurseries

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received during the last two months from the Institute of Personnel Management concerning the taxability of benefit for workplace nurseries.

Mr. Moore: The Institute of Personnel Management wrote to me on this subject on 20 November.

Sterling Exchange Rate

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, over the past two years, what has been the change against the United States dollar of the exchange rate for the £ sterling; and what information he has as to changes against the United States dollar of the currencies of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Venezuela and Nigeria and other oil exporters, respectively.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The percentage changes in the US dollar exchange rate against the currencies requested, between January 1983 (average) and the latest available rates, that is, for 9 January 1985 for all currencies except sterling, for which the closing rate on 14 January is used, are as follows:

	Percentage change
United Kingdom (pound sterling)	−29·3
Saudi Arabia (Riyal)	−3·6
Kuwait (Dinar)	−5·8
Venezuela (Bolivar)	−193·5
Nigeria (Naira)	−20·6
Other major oil exporters
Algeria (Dinar)	−10·7
Indonesia (Rupiah)	−55·5
Iran (Rial)	−12·8
Iraq (Dinar)	*0
Libya (Dinar)	*0
Mexico (Peso)	−116·3
Norway (Krone)	−30·0
United Arab Emirates (Dirham)	*0
USSR (Rouble)	−22·3

* These currencies are pegged against the dollar.

Income Tax

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list by standard economic planning region the yield of income tax per capita for each year since 1977-78.

Mr. Moore: Estimates have been made from sample inquiries and are subject to sampling error. The following table gives estimates of the yield of income tax per capita for each of the standard economic planning regions for the years 1977-78 to 1982-83 (the latest year for which information is available). Estimates of income tax due on income assessable to tax for each financial year have been divided by estimates of the population at the end of the first quarter of the financial year. For years up to and including 1979-80, income tax payable by taxpayers whose main source of income was assessable under schedule D was allocated to the region in which the assessment was made, generally the region in which the business was conducted. For other taxpayers, and from 1980-81 for all taxpayers, the allocation of income tax to region was by place of residence.

Per capita Income Tax due in year (£)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many persons paid income tax in January 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Moore: The number of persons paying income tax in particular months cannot be estimated from Inland Revenue records. The available information relates to financial years and covers persons liable to tax in each financial year. This, including provisional estimates for the current and the two preceding financial years, has been published in table 1.3 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1984".

Independent Schools

Mr. Radice asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount of tax and rate of relief received by independent schools in 1983-84 by virtue of their charitable status.

Mr. Moore: I regret that the information is not available.

Trident

Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the net effect which the Trident project will have on the balance of payments.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No worthwhile estimate of the effect can be made.

HMSO Publications

Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average percentage increase in the retail price of Her Majesty's Stationery Office publications (a) over the last 10 years and (b) over the last five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: Her Majesty's Stationery Office did not begin keeping consistent records of average prices for publications until 1976, so the information is not available in the form requested. The year by year increase since 1976 is as follows:

	per cent.
1977	28
1978	Nil
1979	6
1980	*68
1981	15
1982	18
1983	9
1984	5

* See Note 1.

Notes

1. The HMSO was reconstituted as a trading fund on 1 April 1980 and the exceptionally high year on year increase shown for 1980 reflects action required by statute to cover costs not previously accounted for, as well as increased production costs.

2. Since becoming a trading fund, the aggregate average increase in the price of parliamentary papers (excluding Hansard) is 73 per cent. There has been no increase since April 1983.

Exchange Rates

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the London market rates of exchange at close of business on 11 January between the pound sterling and the currencies of the European member states of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the rates which would correspond to the purchasing power parities of the same currencies on the basis of the recent studies on the subject by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development updated as necessary to the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The closing market exchange rates on 11 January 1985 of sterling against other European Community countries' currencies are given in the following table. The exchange rates that would correspond to aggregate GDP purchasing power parities in 1984, as estimated for the OECD in its December 1984 Working Paper No. 17 "Real Gross Product in OECD Countries and Associated Purchasing Power Parities', are given in brackets. As the working paper explains, purchasing power parities should not be interpreted as equilibrium exchange rates.

Exchange rates (for 11 January 1985) and PPP estimates (for 1984) of other European currencies against the pound sterling

	Exchange rates	Estimated purchasing power parities
Belgium (Franc)	71·27	(70·86)
Denmark (Krone)	12·74	(16·21)
France (Franc)	10·91	(12·28)
West Germany (Mark)	3·56	(4·24)
Greece (Drachma)	145·45	(116·21)
Ireland (Punt)	1·12	(1·14)
Italy (Lira)	2,190·10	(2,224)
Luxembourg (Lux franc)	71·27	(73·22)
Netherlands (Guilder)	4·02	(4·59)

Basic and Social Infrastructure

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he measures the rate of return on (a) basic infrastructure and (b) social infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 487]: All infrastructure projects are assessed on their merits. Financial returns are measured by the net additions to revenue, cost savings or other measures of net benefit expected over the life of the investment. Social considerations are not precisely measurable but are taken into account where appropriate in the final decision.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Water Cannon

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration was given to the use of water cannon before he agreed to the use of baton rounds by police in Great Britain.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Baton rounds were first made available to the police in England and Wales following the serious rioting in 1981. The Department was aware that water cannon were used by some countries for public order purposes, but also that they had rarely proved effective in Northern Ireland. The possible use of water cannon has been kept under review since 1981 and two prototype water cannon have been built, but their evaluation has not yet been completed.

Metropolitan Police (Surplus Living Accommodation)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes he has required or authorised in respect of disposal of surplus living accommodation by the Metropolitan police; and what consultations he undertook prior to any change in the procedures concerned.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None. The Metropolitan police's practice on the sale of land and buildings identified as surplus to requirements is to offer it for sale on the open market, except where it was acquired by compulsory purchase and there is an obligation to offer it back to the original owner. This is consistent with the practice laid down for Government Departments and other public bodies by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and referred to in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) on 13 June 1979, at column 255.

Industrial Accidents

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to revise the joint circular of his Department (ES 7/1975) to take fuller account of major industrial accidents.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes, in order to include reference to recent legislation on major industrial accidents.

War Risks Study (Greater London)

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department intends to supply information and resources for the Greater London area war risks study.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A renewed grant-aid application from the Greater London council for its Greater London area war risks study has been received and is being considered.

Civil Defence

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the new training package for civil defence volunteers will cover law and order.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A working party on the production of standardised training material for volunteers will be convened shortly. We are considering with the police how information can usefully be made available through the working party about police wartime duties and the maintenance of law and order.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department where the site is for the proposed civil defence north Wales regional headquarters; and when building work is expected to begin.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It would not be in the public interest to disclose details concerning this type of administrative centre.

Radiac Meters

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department expects to be able to release the modified Plessey dose rate meter two radiac meters to local authorities.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Issue is expected to begin later this year and be completed during 1986.

West Midlands Police

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with the manpower levels of the West Midlands police force.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is the responsibility of the police authority to maintain an adequate and efficient police force for its area. On 30 November 1984 the West Midlands force had 6,551 police officers and 1,367 full time civilian staff. The staffing levels in relation to population are in line with those in similar areas.

Police Officers (Picket Line Duty)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the administration of justice in the courts has been affected by the attendance of police officers on picket line duty.

Mr. Mellor: The absence of officers on picket line duty may have led some courts on occasion to adjourn proceedings in which an officer's attendance was essential. Otherwise, we have no reason to believe that the administration of justice in the courts has been affected.

Disorder (Brixton)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Home Affairs if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis concerning the incidents of disorder which occurred at Brixton, London, on Sunday 6 January; what was the cause and nature of the disturbance; how many persons were involved; how many were arrested; whether there were any injuries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that on the evening of 6 January 3,000 people attended a reggae concert in aid of Ethiopian famine relief at the Academy, Stockwell road, London SW9. At about 11 pm two police officers attempted to arrest a man who had been detained inside the building by security staff on suspicion of theft and being armed. A number of people intervened to prevent the arrest and the man escaped into the auditorium. The two officers gave chase, but were set upon by members of the audience. One officer received stab wounds to the thigh whilst the other was knocked unconscious by a blow from a bottle. Police reinforcements quickly arrived on the scene and dealt with the disturbance. A further five officers sustained minor injuries. One person was arrested and charged with causing grievous bodily harm with intent.

Cannabis (Conviction Statistics)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions there were in each of the years 1981 to 1984 for the offences of possession of cannabis or cannabis resin, where the amount involved was less than one gramme.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available; the amounts of drugs involved are reported for drugs seizures, but not for drugs offences.

Intoxicating Liquor (On-licences)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many establishments in England and Wales were in possession of a full justices on-licence for the sale of intoxicating liquor in each of the years 1981 to 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of justices on-licences in force on 30 June in 1982 and 1983 is given, by type of premises, in table 1 of "Liquor Licensing Statistics, England and Wales, July 1982-June 1983" (Home Office Statistical Bulletin 24/83), a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House. A breakdown of this information by type of licence is available for public houses, and so on, but not for licensed clubs, restaurants or guest houses. Licences for the sale of intoxicating liquor of all descriptions were held by 67,766 of the public houses and so on, with justices on-licences in force on 30 June 1982 and by 68,421 such premises in 1983. Information for 1981 and 1984 is not available.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the increase over the last five years in (a) recorded criminal offences of any kind and (b) the numbers of those found guilty of criminal offences of any kind.

Mr. Mellor: The information is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 1.1 of the issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9349).

Prisoners (Maintenance Costs)

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the current average weekly cost of maintaining a person in prison and the current average weekly cost of supervising a person under a community service order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: During the financial year 1982-83, the latest year for which comparable figures are available, the average weekly costs of keeping a person in custody was £218, and the estimated weekly cost of supervising a person under a community service order was £10; the latter figure is based on the breakdown of probation service expenditure made by local authorities. The Government are anxious to maximise the use of non-custodial penalties in appropriate cases, but decisions in individual cases must be for the courts.

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of occasions in 1984 in which (i) remand and (ii) sentenced prisoners were held in police cells; and what was the date, location and number of prisoners involved in each occasion.

Mr. Mellor: The numbers of prisoners held in police cells during 1984 are as shown in the following table: so far as I am aware, all the prisoners so held were unsentenced. Compiling further information about location would involve disproportionate cost.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the meeting of the ministerial working group on drug abuse.

Mr. Mellor: The ministerial group on the misuse of drugs has met four times, most recently on 12 December 1984, and is meeting again later this month.

The group is continuing its work of reviewing, co-ordinating and developing the Government's policies to tackle drug misuse across a broad front. It has given particular attention to policies bearing on enforcement and prevention.

Police (Medical Treatment)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers received financial assistance toward dental, optical or medical treatment in 1983 and 1984; what was the cost in each case; and why the officers were assisted.

Mr. Giles Shaw: For the reasons why police officers are reimbursed the costs of NHS prescriptions and dental treatment, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 11 January, at column 560. The other information is not collected centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Unruliness Certificates

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many certificates of unruliness were issued in each of the last five years in respect of 15 and 16-year-old boys.

Mr. Mellor: The following table shows, for each of the past five years, in the first column the number of certificates of unruliness issued in respect of boys aged 15 or 16, and in the second column the number of boys aged 14 to 16 first received into prisons and remand centres, on remand before or during trial, under the unruliness certification procedure. (A fresh certificate is required each time a boy is remanded under the procedure.)

	Certificates for boys aged 15 or 16	*Boys aged 14 to 16

Magistrates' Court, Liverpool

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the provision of a new magistrates' court building in Liverpool.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Responsibility for the provision of magistrates' courthouse accommodation rests in the first instance with the local authority in consultation with the magistrates' courts committee. In February 1983 Home Office approval was given to the city council's scheme for a new major courthouse complex to replace existing facilities in Liverpool with a view to an expected start in 1985. We have recently been informed by the council that it is unable to proceed with this scheme.

Laboratory Animals

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government intend to commission any research into ways of improving the accommodation of laboratory animals.

Mr. Brittan: Yes. The Government are paying £30,000 to the Universities Federation for Animal Welfare for a project into improving the caging of laboratory rodents by finding the conditions most suitable for their well-being. The project will take two years to complete and the results will be reported to the Advisory Committee on Animal Experiments. The Government believe that this work will make an important contribution to the welfare of laboratory animals, by helping laboratories to provide the best possible conditions for the animals.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received representations from the Association of Chief Police Officers about the date set for the implementation of part IX of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Brittan: I met representatives of the association on Thursday 3 January. They indicated to me that in order to prepare their forces adequately to operate the new complaints and discipline procedures they would be assisted by a slight delay in the implementation of part IX of the 1984 Act. I have considered their representations and decided to defer the implementation from 1 March 1985 to 1 April 1985.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

O and A-level Examination Standards

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he satisfies himself that the standard of O and A-level examinations and the standard required at each grade do not vary over time.

Mr. Dunn: The monitoring of examination standards over time is one of the functions of the Secondary Examinations Council, in consultation with the examining boards.

Teachers

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers trained in publicly financed colleges of education are working in the private school sector; and what contribution is made by the private sector to the training costs of such teachers.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has no record of the number of teachers involved. The independent schools sector contributes to the cost of initial teacher training in so far as it pays rates and taxes.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list his powers to set minimum qualifications for teaching in the private sector of education from five to 16-year-olds.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no such powers. However, section 71 of the Education Act 1944 places him under a duty to take action against an independent school which fails to provide efficient and suitable instruction. He would accordingly be concerned about a school in which the teachers had insufficient relevant qualifications or experience.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Electronic Screening Machine, St. Stephen's Entrance

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to ensure that pregnant women are not obliged to pass through the electronic screening machine at St. Stephen's Entrance.

Mr. Biffen: No. I am assured that there is no reason to adopt the measure suggested by my hon. Friend.

ENVIRONMENT

Right to Buy

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue printed forms setting out the written notice claiming the right to buy pursuant to section 5 of the Housing Act 1980 in compliance with the Housing (Right to Buy) (Prescribed Forms) (No. 1) Regulations 1980 which may be used by any individual in relation to any local authority, housing association or other body owing a dwelling-house; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: A revised form for use by tenants in claiming to exercise their right to buy was prescribed in the Housing (Right to Buy) (Prescribed Forms) Regulations 1984 (SI No. 1175). Supplies of the new form were distributed to all local authorities last August and may also be obtained from my Department.

Departmental Staff (Qualifications)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many personnel in his Department have (a) approved professional qualifications and (b) professional and practical experience in the field of rating and valuation generally, and in the field of rating and valuation of commercial and industrial hereditaments, particularly.

Mr. Waldegrave: Both the PSA and DOE(C) employ staff with approved professional qualifications in the field of rating and valuation. In the PSA 317 out of the 409 staff employed as estates surveyors are qualified as chartered surveyors. IN DOE(C), all 15 estates officers are so qualified; these staff have all been trained in rating and valuation practice, including rating and valuation of commercial and industrial hereditaments.

None of the estates surveyors employed by PSA have experience in the field of rating and valuation gained whilst in the Department. Although some will have gained such experience elsewhere before joining PSA, this is not readily available from our records. Of the estates officers employed by DOE(C), over three quarters have had practical rating experience in the past outside the Department, although not currently engaged in rating work. All estates officers in DOE(C) are involved in the evaluation and appraisal of commercial and industrial land and buildings.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of his Department's inspectors possess (a) recognised town and country planning qualifications and (b) have practical and professional experience in the field of town and country planning.

Mr. Macfarlane: 114 full-time housing and planning inspectors, 38 part-time inspectors in the Department of the Environment's planning inspectorate, and 12 inspectors on the Lord Chancellor's panel possess recognised town and country planning qualifications. A further 51 full-time and 43 part-time inspectors and 32 inspectors on the Lord Chancellor's panel hold relevant qualifications in other fields. Some inspectors are qualified in more than one field.

All those inspectors who possess town and country planning qualifications have had practical and professional experience in the field of town and country planning.

Home Improvement Grants

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to publish his Department's proposals in the form of a consultation document on the review of private sector home improvement grants.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales hope to issue a consultation document on private sector home improvement policy as soon as possible.

Councils (Real Estate Transfers)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to monitor the efficacy and the method of the transfer of real estate holdings from the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils to the residuary boards; and what estimates he has made for the stamp duty which will have to be paid in respect of these transfers.

Sir George Young: Transfers of real property to the residuary bodies on the abolition of the GLC and MCCs will take place by the authority of Parliament. There will be no continuing process to monitor, and I do not expect any liability for stamp duty to arise.

Construction Companies (Discrimination)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment pursuant to his Answer to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire on 19 November 1984, Official Report, column 30, if he will describe in detail the options that his Department is examining to prevent local authorities from discriminating against private construction companies for reasons which have nothing to do with the quality of their workmanship.

Mr. Waldegrave: Further to his statement in the House on 7 November my right hon. Friend will very shortly be issuing a consultation paper dealing with this amongst other issues.

Water Metering

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress towards reducing the cost of water metering for domestic use.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 19 November 1984 at column 31.

Natterjack Toad

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to monitor the acidity of breeding pools at one time or presently used by the natterjack toad; and whether he intends to take steps to ensure that this species is protected from (a) collecting, (b) persecution, (c) agricultural, forestry or other development of habitat, and (d) acid deposition.

Mr. Waldegrave: Breeding pools of the natterjack toad are regularly monitored by the voluntary organisations and other researchers and the results are collated by the Nature Conservancy Council.

The species and its places of shelter already have special protection under section 9 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. Where acidity problems are identified the Nature Conservancy Council, in collaboration with other organisations, will take appropriate steps to protect the toad population affected, such as by transferring them to a different site.

Dipper Bird

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the effect of increased acidity of its habitat on the dipper bird.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised by the Nature Conservancy Council that recent studies in central Wales and south west Scotland have revealed that the Dipper has declined over the last 20 years on streams and rivers which are relatively high in acidic levels.

Councillors (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information is available to his Department about expenditure by local authorities on overseas visits by councillors.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is not collected centrally.

Private Graves

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the London boroughs which charge four times the fee for private graves to non-residents as are charged to residents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information requested is not available centrally. Since 1974, the Department has had no responsibility for the level of cemetery fees charged by burial authorities.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold to date in Leicester under the right-to-buy legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Three thousand five hundred and nine council dwellings were sold in Leicester between October 1980 and September 1984 under the right-to-buy legislation.

I hope many more tenants of the city council will take advantage of their right to buy, not least as a result of the wider opportunities provided by the Housing and Building Control Act 1984.

Leicester (Rate-Capping)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what figures he collects as to the costs incurred by Leicester city council in its anti-rate-capping campaign; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: None. But if Leicester city council were genuinely concerned about the provision of services and securing value for money, they would not be wasting their ratepayers' money on this sort of propaganda.

Concrete and Timber Framed Dwellings

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those types of pre-cast reinforced concrete and timber framed dwellings which have been subject to structural analysis at the request of his Department.

Mr. Gow: The Building Research Establishment has investigated the structural condition of the following types of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwelling designed before 1960:

Airey
Ayrshire
Blackburn-Orlit
Boot
Boswell
Butterley
Cornish Unit
Dorran
Dyke
Gregory
Hamish Cross
Lindsay
Minniel
Myton
Newland
Orlit
Parkinson
Reema Hollow Panel
Schindler-Hawkesley SGS
Stent
Stonecrete
Stour
Tarran
Teebeam
Underdown
Unitroy
Unity
Waller Wates
Wessex
Whitson-Fairhurst
Winget
Woolaway

Last autumn the BRE was asked to put in hand a study of the systems used in the 140,000 dwellings built in large reinforced concrete panels in the 1960s and 1970s.

No study of any type of timber-framed house designed before 1960 has been commissioned, but the BRE has examined houses of the Spooner type in Leeds after a house of that type suffered wind damage to its brick cladding. In 1981-83, the BRE studied the use of timber-framed methods in new housing as part of its continuing work on changes in design and construction methods. A number of points arising from the study are the subject of further work by the BRE.

Oil and Gas Operations (Planning Control)

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends that his Department's circular to local authorities containing guidelines for planning control over oil and gas operations will be published.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave yesterday to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) at column 99.

Regional Industrial Assistance

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the total expenditure by local authorities for each region in England on regional industrial assistance for each year since 1979 in cash and real terms using 1984 as the base year.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 15 January 1985, c. 99]: Based on returns provided to the Department by local authorities, it is estimated that capital expenditure by local authorities by region in England, in respect of advances and grants to industrial and commercial enterprises, and in respect of industrial estates for the financial years 1979-80 to 1983-84 was as follows:

£ million

Local industries benefit from expenditure by local authorities under a wide range of other expenditure headings. However it is not possible to identify these benefits separately.

Conservation

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the main policy objectives of his Department in the field of conservation for 1985.

Mr. Waldegrave: In 1985 we shall be aiming to build on the achievements of the last 12 months, and our major objectives in the conservation sphere will be:

— to ensure that, in the light of the overall resources available, the statutory conservation agencies are given the resources necessary to fulfil their statutory responsibilities;
— to ensure that my Department's statutory functions continue to be exercised in the best interests of the heritage, in consultation and co-operation with my noble Friend the Minister for the Arts;
— to consider the Select Committee on the Environment's report on the operation of part II of the Wildlife and Countryside Act and, in consultation with others, issue the Government's response;
— to respond to the Countryside Commission's report "A Better Future for the Uplands";
— to continue to encourage and support the work of the national park authorities;
— subject to the outcome of consultations currently in progress, to extend the application of section 41 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act to the Broads;
— to participate further in the work of the Common Land Forum, aimed at producing agreed proposals for further common land legislation;
— to maintain the high level of inspections of keepers of captive birds in a continuing attempt to eliminate malpractice, and increase the level of scrutiny of sellers of dead birds;
— to continue to provide maximum assistance to enforcement agencies responsible for species conservation at home and abroad;
— to continue to work closely with voluntary and professional bodies concerned with the conservation of the countryside, the natural heritage and the built environment;
— to notify the Bonn convention on the Conservation of Migratory Species of Wild Fauna; — to improve both the quality and efficiency of my Department's endangered species work by computerising the licensing systems during 1985, and to implement the proposals to restrict illegal trade in ivory which we hope will be agreed, with UK support, at the CITES conference in the spring. A specialist publicity leaflet on endangered plants will also be published, as a UK contribution to the World Wildlife Fund's international campaign on plants.
— to ensure that the arrangements made for the management and disposal of household, commercial, industrial and other non-radioactive wastes are adequate and meet acceptable safety, health and amenity standards. To promote efficiency and economy in waste management services.
— the Government will continue to ensure that all necessary steps are taken for the safe meeting of the radioactive wastes that already exist and those that may be created in the future.
— water quality will continue to be maintained and improved.

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the main achievements of his Department in the field of conservation in 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: During 1984 the Government have taken a number of important steps to underline its commitment to and to further the conservation of the natural and the built environment. In particular, we have:

— set up the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission to secure the preservation of historic buildings and ancient monuments in England and to promote public knowledge and enjoyment of the heritage;
— set up the Chatham Historic Dockyard Trust Ltd. with the duty to preserve, promote and manage the historic dockyard as a "living dockyard";
— begun the second phase of the accelerated re-survey to identify buildings of special architectural or historical interest, and during the year, the number of listed buildings rose from 309,000 to 338,000;
— secured the future of Calke Abbey by its acceptance in lieu of tax and its allocation to the National Trust with the benefit of support from the National Heritage Memorial Fund; — substantially increased the number of inspections of premises of breeders of birds of prey to some 1,300 in 1984. This intensification of effort was aimed at minimising the opportunities for feeding into the registration system illegally taken eggs and young;
— assisted national enforcement agencies in some 204 cases in enforcing the birds protection provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act;
— Ratified (i) the Paris protocol to the Ramsar Convention on Wetlands of International Importance especially as waterfowl habitats, and (ii) the UNESCO convention for the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage; — announced our intention to provide substantial additional funds for the statutory conservation agencies in the forthcoming financial year;

— obtained the support of the EC Council of Ministers to request the Commission to report on the relationship between policies for agriculture and for the environment;
— supported the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the Government's initiative to insert a new title in the EC regulation on agricultural structures currently under consideration;
— announced support in principle for a statutory Broads Authority;
— authorised the Countryside Commission to pay an enhanced level of grant-aid for management agreemens to conserve the traditional landscape of the Broads;
— continued to support and initiate relevant research projects (for example into the extent of landscape change);
— continued to work closely with the Nature Conservancy Council in designating sites of special scientific interest. To date some 1,381 sites have been designated, and over 160 management agreements to safeguard some 68,000 hectares of land have been made. A further 600 agreements currently in the pipeline; — made nature conservation orders to secure the protection of four nationally important conservation sites which were under threat;
— designated three areas of special protection of birds under the Wildlife and Countryside Act;
— continued to give strict protection to endangered wildlife, particularly through the new EC regulation implementing the convention on International Trade in Endangered Species (CITES) and by taking a leading part in preparing proposals to curb illegal international trade in ivory, which will be considered at the next CITES conference in 1985;
— 1984 saw the first year's full operation of the Department's Hazardous Wastes Inspectorate, whose aim is to assist local authorities and other bodies to obtain high standards of waste management. Substantial progress has been made in reviewing national legislation and preparing further guidance. In the international field agreement was obtained for an EC directive and also OECD guidelines on transfrontier movement of hazardous wastes;
— The Government announced in December a programme of further major reductions in radioactive discharges from BNFL's nuclear reprocessing plant at Sellafield. In April the Government, in conjunction with the TUC, set up an independent review into the disposal of radioactive waste in the north east Atlantic. The review's report was published in December and the Government have accepted all its recommendations; — In 1984 water quality has been maintained and — as resources permit — improved. From the end of this month all the main features of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 part II will be in place. These include public involvement in decisions on discharge consents, and the extension of control to all inland, underground, estuarial and coastal waters.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Derry

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the population and acreage of (a) the city of Londonderry and (b) the district of Derry.

Mr. Hurd: Information on (a) is not available since, following local government reorganisation in 1973, urban areas are not statutorily defined. The population of the district, estimated at 30 June 1983, is 96,100. The district comprises 38,250 hectares.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has been notified of Derry city council's objection to the revision of the local government electoral boundaries in Derry.

Mr. Hurd: Yes.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement detailing his response to the objection by Derry city council to the revised electoral boundaries for Derry.

Mr. Hurd: The report and final recommendations of the District Electoral Areas Commissioner were laid before Parliament on 5 December. No objection was raised to them in Parliament at that time. The recommendations were subsequently incorporated, without modification, in the schedule to the draft District Electoral Areas (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before Parliament on 19 December 1984, and which is subject to the affirmative resolution procedure.

I am satisfied that the commissioner provided adequate opportunity for representations on his provisional recommendations to be made at public hearings before himself and his assistant commissioners prior to completing his report and making his final recommendations. Having studied the commissioner's recommendations with care, I am satisfied that it would not have been right to make any modifications to them.

SCOTLAND

Dumfries Bypass

15. Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what form of consultations he is having with Dumfries and Galloway regional council over the proposed Dumfries bypass; and when he hopes to announce his decision on the preferred route.

Mr. Younger: My officials met members of the regional council on 10 October to discuss possible lines for the bypass. Following this meeting, two lines have been selected for more detailed study and consulting engineers have been appointed to carry out hydrological and ground investigations on the river crossings for both routes. This work is expected to be completed during 1985 and its results, together with other relevant information including views expressed by the regional council, will be taken into account in my decision on the preferred route.

Glengarnock Steel Works

17. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will initiate a study into the socio-economic effects on the Garnock valley if the threatened closure of Glengarnock steel works were to be implemented.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Following the ending of steelmaking at Glengarnock a working party under Scottish Office chairmanship examined the needs of the area. As a result a task force led by the Scottish Development Agency was set up, and has put £19 million into the economic regeneration of the Garnock valley. The SDA continues to support the Garnock valley development executive. A further study would not serve any useful purpose.

School Education

18. Mr. O'Neil asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will next meet representatives of Scottish teachers to discuss Scottish school education.

Mr. Allan Stewart: At present my right hon. Friend has no meetings arranged with representatives of Scottish teachers, but he is always prepared to consider requests for meetings on matters of mutual concern.

Woodlands

19. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the area of old natural and semi-natural broadleaved woodland which has been lost in the United Kingdom during the last 20 years.

Mr. John MacKay: I cannot give any precise figure, but I understand that it has been estimated that between 30 and 50 per cent. of the ancient semi-natural broadleaved woodland in this country has been lost over the last 40 years.

Inverness Airport

20. Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the effect on the locality of the sale of Inverness airport.

Mr. Ancram: The Government's policy is to ensure that Inverness airport should continue to meet the needs of the community it serves, as cost-effectively as possible.

Transport Policy

21. Mr. David Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to issue a Green Paper on Scottish transport policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I have no such plans.

Airports (Subsidies)

22. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland to what extent he expects the Civil Aviation Authority airports in the Highlands and Islands to be subsidised by Scottish Office funds in the present financial year.

Mr. Ancram: Subsidy of up to £3·45 million will be paid in the financial year 1984-85.

Economic Situation

23. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will meet the Scottish Trades Union Congress general council to discuss the economic situation in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no plans to meet the General Council of the Scottish Trades Union Congress to discuss the economic situation in Scotland. On 25 January, however, he will meet a general delegation, led by the STUC, to discuss the coal dispute.

Crime Statistics

24. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of reported break-ins and attempted break-ins to all forms of property in Scotland for each of the years from 1979 to date; what the percentage increase is from 1979 to date; in how many instances no charges were ever made; and what percentage of the total this represents.

Mr. Ancram: Because of the nature of the information requested, I have arranged for it to be published in the Official Report in tabular form.

Teachers (Pay)

25. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will meet the Education Institute of Scotland to discuss teachers' pay and conditions of service.

Mr. Younger: On 23 October 1984, at my request, I met representatives of the teachers' side of the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education, when all the constitutent teachers' associations, including the Educational Institute of Scotland, were represented. No approach has been made to me about a separate meeting with the EIS. As I indicated earlier today, however, in response to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), I understand that the SJNC(SE) have decided to seek a meeting with me.

29. Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on Scottish teachers' pay, conditions and terms of service.

16. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on Scottish teachers' salaries and conditions.

Mr. Younger: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas).

British Steel Corporation

26. Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next hopes to meet the chairman of the British Steel Corporation to discuss the corporation's activities in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: I met the chairman of the British Steel Corporation on 29 November, when we had a wide-ranging discussion of the corporation's activities in Scotland. I have no plans for a further meeting in the near future.

NHS (Privatisation)

27. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in the privatisation of services within the National Health Service in Scotland; how many health boards are still refusing to seek private tenders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Most health boards are complying with the request to test the cost-effectiveness of their support services, in the first instance by putting out to tender the services at headquarters and in a number of hospitals or clinics. I have asked the four boards which have not so far done so to reconsider their position. All boards are due to report progress to me in April.

Airports

28. Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make an up-to-date statement on the future of the Highlands and Islands airports.

Mr. Ancram: The Civil Aviation Authority has received a number of offers and inquiries. The Government and the authority will now consider these.

Skillcentres

30. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on skillcentres in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The skillcentre training agency of the Manpower Services Commission has prepared a business plan for its long-term future. This entails a reshaping of the skillcentre network, including the closure of two skillcentres and three Skillcentre annexes in Scotland. The Commission will continue its consideration of the plan at its meeting on 24 January.

Renfrewshire (Economic Developments)

31. Mr. Buchan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to meet the chairman of the Scottish Development Agency to discuss economic developments in Renfrewshire.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am in regular contact with the chairman of the Scottish Development Agency on a wide range of economic and industrial issues. In addition, he and I met representatives of Renfrew district council and Strathclyde regional council last September to discuss a local economic initiative for the area. I am following closely the efforts to get this initiative started, and I hope the district council will change its mind and allow its officials to take part in preliminary talks with the agency and the regional council.

Housing Investment Programmes

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the allocation for local authority housing investment programmes for each year since 1974; what has been the number of council houses built each year since that date; and what are the estimates for these two services for 1985.

Mr. Ancram: Gross allocations for investment in local authority housing since the financial year 1978-79, the first year in which such allocations were issued, are given in the table below. Figures giving the number of new dwellings completed by local authorities each year from 1974 to 1983 are published in "Scottish Housing Statistics 1983", a copy of which is available in the Library. It is estimated that local authorities completed 2,000 new dwellings in 1984; no estimate is available for 1985.

Greenock Prison

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the categories of prisoners placed within Her Majesty's prison, Greenock.

Mr. Ancram: There are no prisoners at present in Her Majesty's prison, Greenock. Work has started on the final phase of a major redevelopment programme and the prison is due to reopen in 1986.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number and types of employees, other than prison officers, employed at Her Majesty's prison, Greenock.

Mr. Ancram: One part-time typist is employed there.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the full complement of prison officers and senior staff at Her Majesty's prison, Greenock.

Mr. Ancram: Details of such staff at present in post are as follows:

Staff at post	Number
principal officer	1
principal clerk officer	1
principal works officer	1
senior officer	1
officer	5
works officer	2

Responsibility for the management of the establishment, which is at present being redeveloped, currently rests with the governor of Her Majesty's prison, Barlinnie.

Nautical Education

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the membership of the working party on the review of nautical education in Scotland will be revealed; and whether any of them have specialist nautical experience drawn from industry.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The working party consisted of officials from COSLA and from my Department, including members of Her Majesty's inspectorate, whose task it is to advise on provision in this field. The working party's proposal that nautical education in Scotland should be rationalised was generally welcomed by the companies consulted.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why the report of the working party on the review of nautical education contains no reference to the cost implications of the alternative future options; whether the working party has properly fulfilled the terms of its remit; and what were the terms of remit.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The working party has in my view discharged its remit, agreed between the Scottish Education Department and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, to review the provision of nautical education in Scotland. The working party was not asked to consider the cost implications of the options for rationalisation, but my right hon. Friend and I will take these into account in making our decision.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will extend the limited historical review of nautical education to include modern developments in the offshore industries, before reaching conclusions about the future provision for maritime education in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The working party which has been considering the provision of nautical education in Scotland took account not only of the recent substantial decline in demand for nautical education, but also of the capacity of Scottish centres to meet the needs of the future. My right hon. Friend and I will have in mind such needs, together with likely employer demand for maritime education in Scotland, in reaching decisions.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to the preferred alternative choices of students at Leith nautical college if the college is closed; and what proportion have indicated that they would not choose Glasgow college of nautical studies but go elsewhere in Britain.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I have no proposal before us for the closure of Leith Nautical College. A working party which has reviewed nautical education in Scotland has recommended that certain courses be concentrated at Glasgow college of nautical studies. The position of existing students at LNC would of course be taken into account in the timing of any changes.

Woodland (Sales)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many acres of woodland have been sold by the Forestry Commission during each of the past five financial years; what have been the annual receipts from such sales; and what are the estimated total sales and receipts for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. John Mackay [pursuant to his reply, 21 December 1984, c. 394]: The information is as follows:—

Year ended 31 March	Woodland sold (hectares)	Receipts (£000)
1980	400	365
1981	415	553
1982	1,821	1,700
1983	5,490	7,200
1984	15,363	14,900
The estimated figures for 1984-85 and 1985-86 are:
1985	15,000	16,000
1986	10,000	10,000

SOCIAL SERVICES

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why, when the Government Actuary recommended in paragraph 5.3 of House of Commons Paper No. 451 that the working balance of the national insurance fund should be about one fifth of a year's benefit expenditure, the report by the Government Actuary on the draft of the Social Security (Contributions, Re-Rating) No. 2 Order 1984 (Cmnd. 9386) is based on a working balance of 23 per cent., 25 per cent. and 27 per cent. for the respective years 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86; and what proposals he has for expending the surplus of £1·5 billion on social security benefits in 1985-86.

Mr. Newton: In House of Commons Paper No. 451 of Session 1981-82 (July 1982) the Government Actuary indicated that, in the prevailing circumstances, about one-fifth of a year's benefit expenditure would be an adequate working balance. In his report on the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1983 (Cmnd. 8969, July 1983), he reported that he had recommended to the Department a minimum target balance of one-sixth of the year's estimated benefit expenditure. The main aim, under the pay-as-you-go system of financing national insurance benefits, is to ensure that taking one year with another, the income of the national insurance fund is sufficient to cover its expected expenditure, and also to keep a prudent reserve to cover operating margins, fluctuations in income and expenditure, and a risk margin against unforeseen contingencies. It has to be recognised however that these decisions have also to be set in the context of wider fiscal policy.

The Government's Actuary's estimates of 23 per cent., 25 per cent. and 27 per cent. respectively for the Aprils of 1984, 1985 and 1986 do not depart from established standards. During the 10-year period from 1976 to 1986, for example, the proportion of annual benefit expenditure will have fluctuated between just over 20 per cent. (1983) and just over 40 per cent. (1978).

Neither the size of the balance in the national insurance fund, nor adjustments to it resulting from individual years' surpluses or deficits, have been regarded as relevant in taking decisions on benefit expenditure.

Cost Rent Scheme

Dr. Owen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate by how much the limits of the cost rent scheme for general practitioners were increased both nominally and in real terms in 1984; and whether he has any plans to raise the limits in 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No increase took place in 1984. We last raised the cost limits on 15 August 1983.

Cost limits for the scheme are adjusted by reference to movements in the price index of public sector housing, which reflects tender price movements in England and Wales. Adjustments are made whenever the index forecasts a movement of 5 per cent. or more up or down from the figure obtaining when the limits were last adjusted. Increase or decrease in the cost limits in 1985 will depend on the extent of the movement in the index during that year.

Residential Homes

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the numbers of persons being cared for in residential homes in each year since 1979 up to the latest figures available.

Mr. John Patten: Complete information in the form requested is no longer available centrally. The available information for the years 1979 to 1984 is given in the table. Further details are given in the Department's publications "Residential Accommodation for the Elderly and for Younger Physically Handicapped People" and "Home and Hostels for the Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped", copies of which are held in the Library.

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how much money has been spent by his Department on residential homes in each year since 1979 up to the latest figures available (a) nationally, (b) in the Tyne and Wear county area and (c) in the south Tyneside district area;

(2) what is the total amount of money spent by his Department on personal social services in each year since 1979 up to the latest available figures.

Mr. Patten: Local authorities are the principal providers of personal social services. Apart from limited sums, spent mainly on social work training, amounting to around £10 million in 1983-84, the Department does not undertake spending itself. Central Government support for local authority spending is principally through the block grant which is not hypothecated to individual services.

Net current expenditure by local authorities on the personal social services is as follows:

£ million cash

	England: All personal Social Services	England: Residential Homes	Tyne and Wear Residential Homes	South Tyneside Residential Homes
1978-79	1,062	487	1·9	14·6
1979-80	1,305	605	2·3	18·8
1980-81	1,616	750	3·0	23·0
1981-82	1,792	814	3·4	24·1
1982-83	1,967	871	3·5	25·0
1983-84	2,142	915	3·7	26·7

Notes:
1. 1983-84 England figures are provisional.
2. The main client groups covered by the residential homes figures are the elderly, children, younger physically disabled, mentally handicapped and mentally ill.

Home Helps

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the current figures for the number of persons receiving home help services; and what information he has as to (a) what age groups they are in and (b) their residential status.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not available centrally. Figures showing total number of cases attended during the year are published annually by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in their report "Personal Social Services Statistics". Their latest report, although not entirely complete in coverage, shows that in 1982-83 home helps in England attended a total of 684, 368 clients. In 1979, when equivalent figures were last collected by the Department, the following was the break-down of clients by age groups:

	per cent.
persons aged under 65	12
persons aged 65 to 74	29
persons aged 75 and over	59

Almost all home help services are provided to those living at home but no information is available centrally about the proportions of clients who own or rent their own accommodation or live in council owned housing.

Vibration White Finger

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action is being taken to implement the recommendations of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council in Cmnd. 8350 "Vibration White Finger" that vibration white finger should be prescribed as an industrial disease.

Mr. Newton: Regulations to give effect to the Council's recommendations are being drafted. We hope to implement them in April.

National Insurance Contributions

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the total value of the national insurance contributions of a male and of a female employee retiring in April 1984 after a career at the national average wage, and of their employer, assuming a combined augment at compound interest of 2½ per cent. plus compensation for changes in the retail price index calculated at annual costs.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Emigration

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have emigrated from Britain in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: Estimated annual totals for the United Kingdom, excluding any emigration to the Republic of Ireland, are:

	Emigrants (thousands)
1979	189
1980	229
1981	233
1983	185

These figures are estimated from the international passenger survey, in which an emigrant is defined as a person who has lived in the United Kingdom for at least one year and intends to reside abroad for a year or more. The survey does not cover journeys to (or from) the Republic of Ireland. Further details are published in Population Trends and in the "OPCS Monitor" series MN.

Pension Age (Reduction)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of reducing the pension age for men to 60 years within one financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) on 3 December 1984 at column 78.

Retirement

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of men who defer retirement from 65 to 69 years of age.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that about 55,000 men in the 65-69 age band are currently deferring retirement.

Generic Drugs

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of generic drugs prescribed under the National Health Service under the last year for which figures are available were manufactured in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is not available.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he proposes to take following the implementation of his proposals for a limited list of drugs to ensure that generic products which are imported into the United Kingdom meet with the same quality control requirements to which the United Kingdom industry is subject.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No special steps are required. For any medical product, including a generic product, to be marketed in the United Kingdom, the Licensing Authority has to be satisfied that the product is safe, efficacious and of good quality under the Medicines Act 1968. The licensing authority also has to be satisfied that the product has been manufactured to acceptable standards under United Kingdom (or European Community) licensing arrangements.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report all those preparations on his proposed limited list of drugs available under the National Health Service which are not currently available from the United Kingdom manufacturers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The limited list is not yet finalised but we expect that most if not all of the products included will be available from United Kingdom manufacturers.

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what further representations he has received about the deadline set for the consultation period regarding the provisional limited list of drugs available through National Health Service prescriptions and about subsequent opportunities for review of any list which is introduced;

(2) what opportunities for subsequent review will apply to the proposed limited list of drugs available through National Health Service prescription after 1 April 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have not specifically identified among the representations received any comments about the period allowed for consultation. The evaluation of new products after 1 April will be fully considered during our consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drug industry.

Health Authorities (Managers)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has refused to authorise the appointment of any regional or district general managers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: General manager appointments are made by the health authority concerned. But, as part of my right hon. Friend's broad responsibility to oversee the successful establishment of the general management function in the National Health Service, Ministers confirm that he is content before an authority proceeds to final decision. Our guidance about the implementation of Griffiths has made the position quite clear to authorities.

NHS (Waiting Lists)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures for the number of patients on National Health Service waiting lists in the areas covered by (a) the Northumbria regional health authority and (b) the South Tyneside area health authority; and how these figures compare with the figures for each year since 1979-80.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Achievements and Objectives)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the principal achievements of the National Health Service in 1984;

(2) what are his principal objectives for the National Health Service in 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women in England and Wales have died of cancer of the cervix in the age groups (a) 20 to 24 years, (b) 25 to 29 years, (c) 30 to 34 years, (d) 35 to 39 years, (e) 40 to 44 years, (f) 45 to 49 years, (g) 50 to 54 years, (h) 55 to 59 years, (i) 60 to 64 years, (j) 65 to 69 years, and (k) 70 years and over; and what was the total number in each year since 1978.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is shown in the table:

Numbers of female deaths assigned to cancer of the cervix uteri, 1978 to 1983 (ICD code 180)

England and Wales

Year	All ages	Age at death (years) 20-24	25-29	30-34	35-39	40-44	45-49	50-54	55-59	60-64	65-69	70 and over

1983	1,959	3	43	78	92	104	127	155	184	265	214	694

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many smears and how many positive smears for cervical cancer were taken in England and Wales in the age groups (a) 15 to 19 years, (b) 20 to 24 years, (c) 25 to 29 years, (d) 30 to 34 years, (e) 35 to 39 years, (f) 40 to 44 years, (g) 45 to 49 years, (h) 50 to 54 years, (i) 55 to 59 years, (j) 60 to 64 years, (k) 65 to 69 years and (l) 70 years and over; and what was the total in each year since 1974.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information is not available in the exact form requested. The available information is given in the tables.

Number of cervical smear tests diagnosed as positive in England and Wales, 1974-1983

* The age breakdown for the years 1974-1981 was estimated from a sample of records at the National Health Service Central Register at Southport. Data from this source is no longer available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the Government did not accept the recommendations of the Committee on Gynaecological Cytology that the cervical cancer national recall scheme should be replaced by local call and recall schemes.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government accepted the recommendation made by the committee on gynaecological cytology, in its "Age and Frequency Report", that the national recall scheme should be replaced by local schemes, and guidance was issued to the National Health Service on the organisation of local recall schemes in 1981. The benefit of call schemes has not yet been proven and we are currently funding a research study to evaluate a call versus a recall scheme.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many taxis, and at what total cost, were used by the ambulance service of the Northern regional health authority each year from 1979 to 1984; and from which companies the taxis were hired in each year.

Mr. John Patten: This sort of detailed information is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the Northern regional health authority.

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) ambulance, (b) ambulance depots and (c) ambulance drivers were employed by the Northern regional health authority for each year between 1979 and 1984.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Contracts)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will advise regional and district health authorities not to place contracts with companies who have not filed their accounts by the end of the previous financial year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. It is for authorities to decide on the suitability of companies before placing contracts with them.

Health Authorities (Managers)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether health authorities consult the relevant officers before appointing general managers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 511]: No, as officers are frequently candidates for appointment themselves and it is the authority itself and not its officers who must make the appointment.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the names and former occupations of all general manager appointments made to date as a result of the Griffiths proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 66]: The table shows the sources of recruitment of general managers appointed at regional and district levels. No appointments have yet been made at unit level.

Occupation before appointment	Region	District
NHS administrator	9	61
NHS treasurer	1	3
NHS doctor	1	5
NHS nursing officer	1	—
Total NHS officers	12	69
Non-NHS employment	—	7
Total appointments to date	12	76
Outstanding appointments	2	116
Eventual total	14	192

The figures for regional appointments differ from those I gave in my reply to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 30 October 1984 at columns 953-54 in that since then two more appointments of administrators have been made and one treasurer has withdrawn from his appointment.

Specific information on individual appointees and their former occupations could be assembled only at disproportionate cost.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many miners have returned to work since the coal mining dispute began; if he will give the monthly figures of those miners available for work; what is their percentage of the total work force; how much coal is being produced per man; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that since the dispute began there have been 28,000 new faces reporting for work. There are now around 74,000 NCB employees in grades represented by the NUM, and around 107,000 workers in the industry as a whole, not on strike. There are currently 71 pits producing coal.

Northumberland and Durham Coalfields

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish the latest figures of the amount of investments in the Northumberland and Durham coalfields, each year from 1979-80, with the projected figures for the next five years.

Mr. David Hunt: Mining investment in the North East area of the NCB was:

	£ million
1979-80	46
1980-81	51
1981-82	45
1982-83	39
1983-84	39

HOME DEPARTMENT

Miss Hilda Murrell

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report his letter of 14 January to the hon. Member for Linlithgow on the late Miss Hilda Murrell.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. The text is as follows:

"When I spoke to you on 28th December about my letter rejecting your claim of British Intellingence participation in the events surrounding the death of Miss Hilda Murrell, you said that you would also wish me to respond to the detailed questions about the case with which you opened your speech to the House on 19th December. I have now also received your letters of 24th and 29th December. It may be most straightforward if I deal with the questions in the order in which you raised them.

The police confirmed at Miss Murrell's inquest that there was evidence within the house of a thorough and systematic search and a struggle between Miss Murrell and her assailant, which might well have served to add to the disorder. However, I understand from the Chief Constable of West Mercia Constabulary that the terms "ransacked" is an exaggeration of the true extent of the disorder and has not been used by them in describing the break-in at Miss Murrell's home to the press.

The police have confirmed that the telephone at Miss Murrell's home in Shrewsbury had been disconnected. At first they believed that this had been done by means of removing the connectors at the junction box but at no time, I understand, have the police used the term "sophisticated" to describe the way in which it was done. In the absence of any further evidential confirmation that this was the means of disconnection and after subsequent checks of the junction box, the police now believe that the connecting wires were simply snatched out but that, possibly because the connecting screws were loose, this was the point at which the wires became detached. I further understand that Miss Murrell had a telephone extension in her bedroom, the effect of which to anyone telephoning her would be as you described in the House. As to the telephone in Miss Murrell's cottage at Llanymynech, the fault was discovered by one of Miss Murrell's neighbours in Shrewsbury who, in telephoning Llanymynech in an attempt to trace her, was unable to get through and reported the fault to the telephone exchange. Subsequent checks by telephone engineers revealed that it was out of order because of an electrical fault due to storm damage: no human interference in its operation was evident.

At the inquest the police presented the Home Office Pathologist's report on the wounds which had been inflicted on Miss Murrell. These confirmed that there was no physical evidence of an actual sexual assault upon her; there were however signs in her house of some attempted sexual activity towards her. Even if the unnecessary distress to the family were not a factor, the Chief Constable is unable for properly operational reasons to disclose details of what these signs are: you will recognise that they could prove to be crucial evidence in any future criminal proceedings.

As I said in the House, Miss Murrell's car was first reported to the police by a local farmer on the afternoon of Wednesday, 21st March, as having been abandoned at Hunkington in the ditch of the road running adjacent to the copse where her body was subsequently found. Two officers investigated the report within an hour but, because there were no apparent suspicious circumstances, only superficial damage to the car and no apparent danger or obstruction to the public from the car, took no further direct action. They did, however, check the registration number of the car immediately and obtained the correct name and address of the keeper (Miss Murrell); the Chief Constable informs me that claims that the wrong registration number was checked are factually incorrect: no such error occurred and no comment to that effect was made on Friday, 23rd March by the Shrewsbury police.

On Friday, 23rd March the farmer telephoned the police again to inform them that the car was still in the ditch. An attempt by the police to telephone Miss Murrell met with no reply. The Chief Constable informs me that, having obtained no reply to his telephone call the police officer then went to visit Miss Murrells house: he arrived at 7.00 pm., found the door unlocked and entered the house where a light was on; he saw nothing untoward however (which confirms the police's point about subsequent misuse of the word "ransacked"), assumed that Miss Murrell had left the house briefly and therefore had no reason to make a further search. In leaving the house he requested that further attempts be made to contact Miss Murrell: I now understand these were made by telephone and not by visit as I reported in the debate. I apologise for this error. As I described in the 3rd paragraph the fact that the telephone had been disconnected would not be apparent to an outside caller.

A further visit was made by another police officer at about 7 am on Saturday, 24th March who, making a quick search of the house, found it in the same state as I have described above and the door still unlocked. He returned at about 8.15 am to find the same scene and locked the door; he made enquiries of neighbours and relatives as to where she might be. Miss Murrell's gardener and a neighbour arrived at about 9 am and were able to confirm that a burglary appeared to have taken place. An intensification of police activity had already begun with the result, as you know, that a police officer and the gamekeeper's wife, searching the area near to where the car had been abandoned, found the body in the copse. This police officer noted the time of discovery of Miss Murrell's body as 10.25 am: the police have no record of, nor any reason to believe, that Commander Green was subsequently told different times for the discovery of her body.

The Chief Constable informs me that there is similarly no truth in the "New Statesman" article's claim that the police forced an entry into Miss Murrell's home on the morning of Saturday, 24th March: I have already explained that the police officer who visited her house on Saturday morning found the door unlocked and therefore forcible entry was not required. Indeed it was he who secured the door. I have already explained in my letter of 28th December that the West Mercia Special Branch were consulted by their colleagues in the early stages of the investigation; and I explained the reasons why that was so. To avoid any misunderstanding, I should add that although that ended the involvement of the force's Special Branch in the case, experienced detective officers from Special Branch were subsequently used, not in any respect in a Special Branch role, to assist in routine work connected with this major murder enquiry, which placed a very heavy burden on the detective manpower of a relatively small force such as West Mercia.

Turning to the availability to Miss Murrell's family of the post-mortem report, the release of this on formal application is a matter entirely within the coroner's discretion and not one in which I would intervene. As you say, they would have been entitled to have an independent post-mortem examination: a matter on which their legal adviser would have been expected to inform them. One of the injuries listed in the Home Office Pathologist's report to the coroner was a severe bruise to the right cheek and this may be the mark of a blow below the eye to which Commander Green was referring. The determination of cause of death is however a matter for the coroner and not for a Home Office Minister to determine; as I said in the House, it is recorded on the inquisition as hypothermia.

To put the record straight about the subsequent autopsy and the release of Miss Murrell's body for burial, I have necessarily to touch on somewhat distressing detail. In view of the deteriorating condition of the body, which was stored under refrigeration which, while it retards, does not stop deterioration, a second autopsy was carried out in August by an independent pathologist (who is also on the Home Office list) at the request of the coroner on the advice of the Director of Public Prosecutions, before the body was released by the coroner for disposal. It was carried out for the benefit of the defence of any person who, not yet in custody, may be charged with an offence in connection with the death. It was established at the inquest that the results of the two examinations were entirely consistent, the details of the second were not therefore necessary for the conduct of the inquest. In order not to prejudice any future criminal proceedings, neither post-mortem report was formally disclosed. You will have seen the letter on this point to the "Times" on 10 January from the Pathologist who conducted the first post-mortem.

In dealing with bodies in a deteriorated condition undertakers provide a leak proof container, hence the zinc lined coffin. In the United Kingdom bodies are stored in whatever facilities are available in a particular mortuary, in this case refrigeration but not a deep freeze. The release of a body for disposal is again a matter entirely within the coroner's discretion and I cannot comment on that. Arrangements for disposal subsequent to the release of the body are matters within the control of the family, in consultation with the undertakers whom they selected to arrange Miss Murrell's cremation.

You referred also in your speech to the evidence of Mr. Scott who did not see Miss Murrell's body when he walked on Thursday, 22nd March in the copse where it was subsequently found. This claim seems to me to be one incapable of substantiation either way: while Mr. Scott may know the area extremely well, the pathologist's evidence suggests that she died on Wednesday 21st March in the position in which she was found and the police consider that the fact that Miss Murrell was left in a slight hollow, dressed in clothing of a colour which merged in with that of the undergrowth, could well explain why her body was not noted either by Mr. Scott or by the other witness who, you say, has now come forward about this.

You have yourself dismissed the connection between her death and Miss Murrell's views on nuclear power. However, you referred in the House to her telephone conversation with Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Grenville. They have been interviewed by the police, as have other people with whom Miss Murrell might have been expected to speak on this subject but none said that they had had a similar conversation with her. In the circumstances, the police are unable to take this further. As to your general comments that the police were responsible to the case in a way which was both incompetent and out of character, these are purely subjective assessments and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on them.

I hope that having given you this extremely detailed reply to your other questions you will agree that this discharges the undertaking I gave you in the debate. I trust that you will discharge your obligations as a citizen by giving the West Mercia officers your fullest assistance when you meet them tomorrow."

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the Minister of State's statement on 19 December 1984, Official Report, column 470, if he will call for a report from the chief constable of West Mercia police as to which day reference was made to establish on the police national computer the ownership of the car, registration number LNT 917W; and what action was taken to try to seek the owner.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The car in question was that belonging to Miss Hilda Murrell and the information requested was contained in my letter of 14 January to the hon. Member, the text of which I have published in answer to his previous question.

Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (Report)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on his proposed plans and priorities for the coming year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I am placing copies of the Commissioner's recent report to me in the Library of the House and I have sent a copy to every right hon. and hon. Member for a constituency in the Metropolitan police district. I hope to meet London Members soon to discuss the Commissioner's proposals and that it will be possible to find time to give the House an opportunity to debate the report before Easter.

I have studied the Commissioner's report carefully and have discussed its proposals fully with him. 1984 was a year of consolidation during which steady progress was made by the force in developing and further refining the strategy which I agreed a year ago. I remain convinced, as does the Commissioner, that a strategy which continues to focus on the more effective use of manpower, on clearer objectives against crime, and on public co-operation, will best deliver the service that Londoners seek.

Last year's rise in crime is disappointing, but the Commissioner is able to report an encouraging improvement in the clear-up rate achieved against burglary and an increase in the number of offences of street robbery cleared up. The force is particularly to be congratulated on the continued development of neighbourhood watch. I believe that the successful launch of these schemes in a short time reflects a growing understanding amongst Londoners of their responsibility to co-operate with the police in preventing crime. The report also shows evidence of a continuing concern to achieve more effective use of expensive manpower and other resources, and to ensure that officers at all levels are aware of their personal responsibility to secure value for money. I have stressed to the Commissioner that I shall expect to see an increasingly sharp focus on sound financial planning and management.

The Commissioner's aim in 1985 will be further to improve the quality of service offered through:

(a) the reduction of criminal opportunity through crime prevention, public contact, involvement and co-operation;

(b) the enhanced detection of specific criminal offences namely robbery, burglary, drug abuse, racial attacks, vandalism and autocrime, in accordance with locally or centrally identified priorities;

(c) the effective, efficient and economic use of manpower and other resources; and

(d) the development of corporate and personal professionalism.

I particularly endorse the Commissioner's determination to deal effectively with drugs offences and racial attacks. I have emphasised to him that I regard it as of the highest importance that every effort is made to achieve results in these areas.

As I have already announced, a major development this year will be the restructuring of the force so that more of the available resources can be concentrated on operational policing at divisional level. The reorganisation will take two years to complete. As police authority I shall be consulted at every stage.

Royal Commissions

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many royal warrants establishing royal commissions he and his predecessors have signed since 1945; and what were the subjects the commissioners investigated, the dates they were established, who chaired them, and the dates they reported.

Mr. Brittan: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Prison Population

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the male prison population on 25 December 1982, 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Mellor: The information for 25 December 1982, 1983 and 1984 is not recorded centrally. The total male population of prison department establishments on 31 December was as follows:

	Number
1982	40,903
1983	39,976

The figures for 31 December 1984 are still being collated. My noble Friend will write to the hon. and learned Member when they are available.

Pentonville Prison

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of days in 1983 and 1984 that dental clinics were cancelled in Pentonville prison, the number of clinics cancelled, the number of prisoners involved and the reasons for the cancellations.

Mr. Mellor: Some of these matters are at issue in a civil legal action and it would not, therefore, be appropriate to comment at this time.

Drug Dependants

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of drug dependants in prison at the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: The information is not available in the form requested.

Drink-Driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce measures which oblige magistrates to impose more stringent sentences for drink-driving offences.

Mr. Mellor: Courts convicting defendants of such offences must disqualify them from driving for at least a year and endorse their licences unless their are special reasons, relating to the offence, for not doing so. They may in addition impose a fine of up to £2,000 or imprisonment for up to six months, or both; we are satisfied that this element of the penalty should, as with other offences, remain within the court's discretion.

Citizenship

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances a stateless person, married to a British citizen, working and resident indefinitely abroad, may acquire British citizenship.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

HMS Conqueror (Log Books)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about the progress of police inquiries into the disappearance of log books from HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the inquiries which the Director of Public Prosecutions asked him to undertake are continuing.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have served prison sentences for non-payment of fines of less than £25 at Winson Green prison in the past three months.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available centrally.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have served sentences of less than one week at Winson Green prison, Birmingham, in the past three months.

Mr. Mellor: According to the provisional records held centrally, about 20 persons were initially received into Birmingham prison in the last three months of 1984 to serve sentences of less than one week.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the annual cost to public funds of a prisoner at Winson Green prison, Birmingham; and how this changes for sentences of less than one week.

Mr. Mellor: The costs of holding different types of prisoner in penal establishments are not available; nor, at present, are the costs of individual establishments. During the financial year 1982-83, the latest year for which information is available, the average annual cost of keeping a person in a local prison or remand centre was £10,440.

Police (Medical and Dental Treatment)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total annual cost of reimbursing police officers the cost of National Health Service prescriptions and dental treatment.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total cost in each of the last 10 years of providing free dental and medical treatment to police officers.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contribution his Department and the police will be making to Exercise Brave Defender.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Department will not be participating in this exercise, which is a military home defence exercise to test the plans for the protection of vital installations in conventional war. The police are being consulted during its planning but it is too early to say whether, and if so to what extent, they will participate in the exercise itself.

SCOTLAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs he estimates have been created as a result of automatic regional development grants in each year since 1979.

Mr. Allan Stewart: It is not possible to make a meaningful estimate of jobs created as a result of regional development grants because before 29 November 1984 they were not linked to the creation of jobs. The Co-operative Agency and Industrial Development Act, which came into effect on 29 November 1984, introduced a new scheme of regional development grants which will provide more cost-effective regional incentives with greater emphasis on job creation and which will remove the previous bias towards capital-intensive projects. Small firms will still be able to claim regional development grants where no new jobs are created, but the majority of regional development grants will be related directly to job creation.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people joined the unemployment register in Scotland in each month from June 1984 to December 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information of this nature is now available in the House of Commons Library, as was indicated in my right hon. Friend's letter to all Scottish Members of 22 October 1984.

Housing Authorities (Interest Rates)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce a revised 1985-86 Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Order or a variation order under section 3 of the Housing (Financial Provisions) Scotland Act 1978 to compensate housing authorities for the latest increase in interest rates.

Mr. Ancram: The draft Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1985 was laid before the House on 11 January and will be debated on the floor of the House shortly. My right hon. Friend will consider introducing a variation order later in the year. In reaching his decision, he will take into account the pattern of interest rates during the year.

Fishing Vessels

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and types of fishing vessels acquired by fishermen in the years 1979 to 1983 with the financial assistance from the Highlands and Islands Development Board and (b) the yards where these vessels were built.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Fisheries Protection

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce a decision concerning the placing of an order for the construction of a fisheries protection vessel for the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend is considering replacing the FPV Norna which was commissioned in 1959. A contract has been placed for the preparatory design work. It is too early to say when tenders might be invited and an order placed.

EMPLOYMENT

Gas Explosion (Putney)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has yet received an interim report from the Health and Safety Commission on the investigation into the explosion at Newnham house, Manor Fields, Putney, on 10 January.

Mr. Tom King: I am advised by the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission that the investigators from the Health and Safety Executive believe they may have identified the source of the gas explosion.

Following detailed tests, a fracture in the cast-iron pipe that served Newnham house has been traced. Indications are that the gas seeped from the cracked mains into spaces below the building, including a service duct that ran the length of Newnham house.

Further work will be undertaken by the executive to identify the probable passage of gas through the building and to locate the seat of the explosion. I have asked the chairman to ensure that this work, and the publication of a full report on the findings of the investigation, proceeds with all due speed.

Vibration Diseases

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what are the current guidelines for monitoring the vibration levels of any vibrating surface which causes discomfort, numbness or deadfinger at United Kingdom workplaces;

(2) what steps the Health and Safety Executive is taking regarding the risk to workers from vibration diseases.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The British Standards Institution has published draft guidance on evaluation of the risk to health from vibration in BS DD 32 "Guide to the evaluation of human exposure to whole-body vibration" and BS DD 43 "Guide to the evaluation of exposure of the human hand-arm system to vibration". In 1980 the HSE published "Vibration Injuries of the Hand and Arm: their Occurrence and the Evolution of Standards and Limits" (HSE research paper 9); and in 1982 the executive published guidance on the control of chain saw vibration in its guidance note PM 31 "Chain saws". The executive is preparing further guidance on injuries caused by hand-arm vibration and ways of controlling the risk.

Wherever vibration is a risk to the health of persons at work, the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 requires that such action as is reasonably practicable be taken to minimise the risk. When considering whether action is needed in any particular case, HSE inspectors refer to the existing guidance and can seek expert advice from specialists and from the Employment Medical Advisory Service. The Health and Safety Executive is carrying out a survey to discover the extent to which tools and processes associated with vibration white finger are used in industry. The results are expected to be available by the end of 1986.

Notifiable Installations

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make arrangemens for each hon. Member to receive a list of notifiable installations in their constituencies from the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Section 28 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act prevents the Health and Safety Executive from providing formal lists of installations notified under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982, but the executive would discuss informally the position in an hon. Members's constituency. The Health and Safety Commission is currently reviewing whether more information could be made available to the public and whether the operation of section 28 presents an obstacle to the disclosure of information which the public might reasonably need.

ENERGY

Colliery Review Procedures

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy what alterations were made to colliery review procedures by the National Coal Board in the year preceding the start of the current mining industrial dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

Subsidence (Compensation)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what steps he has taken to implement recommendations in the Waddilove report on subsidence compensation;

(2) whether he proposes to consult representatives of surface interests affected by mining subsidence on the introduction of measures to meet the recommendations of the Waddilove report on subsidence compensation.

Mr. David Hunt: We are giving very careful and urgent consideration to the Waddilove committee's recommendations. In addition, all organisations who gave evidence to the committee were asked for their comments on the recommendation when the report was published. These are also being studied.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has held with the National Coal Board on the recommendations of the Waddilove report on subsidence compensation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Officials from my Department and the National Coal Board have met on a number of occasions to discuss in detail the recommendations made in the Waddilove report. The whole question of subsidence compensation and the adequacy of the present system is being given urgent and serious consideration by both Government and the board.

Power Stations

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will estimate, for the first 5 per cent. of a reduction of 60 per cent. on 1980 levels of sulphur dioxide emissions from power stations in the Central Electricity Generating Board system, by 1995, what the cost of sulphur abated per tonne would be through (a) electricity or energy conservation, (b) flue gas desulphurisation, (c) substitution of nuclear power by commissioning new plant and (d) coal washing;

(2) what information he has as to the number of fossil fuel power stations which would need to be fitted with flue gas desulphurisation equipment if sulphur dioxide emissions from this source were to be reduced by (a) 30 per cent. (b) 60 per cent. and (c) 80 per cent.

Mr. Goodlad: These are matters for the Central Electricity Generating Board and I am asking the chairman to reply to the hon. Member.

Coal Production

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many mines were producing coal on 14 January; and how this compares with three months previously.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that 71 pits were producing coal on 14 January. On 15 October the equivalent figure was 55.

Energy Demand

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report the most up-to-date estimates made by his Department of total United Kingdom energy demand over the next 10 years; and if he will show his Department's estimates for the years 1980 to 1983 and the actual demand in each of those years.

Mr. Peter Walker: Forecast estimates of energy demand for each of the next 10 years are not available. However my Department's energy projections, presented as an annex to the proof of evidence to the Sizewell inquiry, indicate that the total primary energy demands for the United Kingdom in the years 1990 and 2000 could be in the ranges 339-396 and 328-461 million tonnes of coal equivalent respectively.

The latest document* which included a forecast of energy demand in 1980 was published by the Department in 1976. No forecasts were made for the individual years 1981-1983. The document estimated the primary energy demand, on the assumptions shown, as 360-385mtce. The actual demand in the years 1980-83 is shown in the table.

United Kingdom Total Primary Energy Demand

	Million tonnes coal equivalent
1980	340·5
1981	329·9
1982	324·8
1983	326·5

All figures include fuels used for non energy purposes.

* United Kingdom Energy Supply and Demand Prospects. National Energy Conference 1976.

Coal Exports

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are his estimates of the likely effects on coal exports of the depreciation of the pound sterling to parity with the dollar.

Mr. David Hunt: There has been no depreciation of the pound sterling to parity with the dollar.

NCB (Profitability)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his Department's estimate of the effects on the National Coal Board's profitability of the depreciation in the value of the pound sterling since March 1984.

Mr. David Hunt: This is essentially a matter for the NCB. Depreciation of the pound against the dollar should, on balance, have a beneficial impact on the NCB's profitability, but this will be very small in comparison with the losses that were being incurred and those resulting from the damage to coal faces and market prospects by the present unjustified industrial action by some sections of the NUM.

Coal Faces (Deterioration)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many coal faces have deteriorated and are now deemed to have been lost to future production in mines considered by the National Coal Board to be economically viable.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that 25 producing faces are now regarded as lost.

DEFENCE

RAF Stanmore Park

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has been able to reach any decision on the future use of RAF Stanmore park.

Mr. Lee: Studies are currently in hand into how we might rationalise our holdings of defence lands in the London area, including Stanmore park. It is too early to say what the outcome of these studies will be, but I will write to my hon. Friend when I have more definite information.

Crown Proceedings Act 1947

Mr. John Browne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act in so far as it affects the rights of members of the Territorial and Reserve Forces to claim redress from his Department in the event of negligence.

Mr. Lee: I cannot add to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for the New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) on 13 December 1984, at column 100, concerning the review of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947.

Plutonium

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report all the military uses to which plutonium is put.

Mr. Butler: Plutonium is used in the defence nuclear programme.

Uranium

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will make a statement on the use of depleted uranium in military equipment;

(2) how much depleted uranium has been purchased for military use in each of the last three years for which figures are available; and from whom.

Mr. Butler: A comprehensive statement on the use of depleted uranium in anti-armour ammunition was placed in the Library of the House on 8 March 1979, at columns 777-78, by the then Secretary of State for Defence, and a further statement was made by the then Secretary of State on 25 January 1980 at column 395. The research and development programme to which these statements refer is continuing. Depleted uranium to the value of some £100,000 in 1981-82, £200,000 in 1982-83 and £300,000 in 1983-84 has been procured for the programme from British and overseas sources.

I am today replying to a separate question from the hon. Member on the use of depleted uranium in the Phalanx close-in weapon system.

Additionally, depleted uranium may be used in the defence nuclear programme. For security reasons, it is a long-standing practice not to reveal details, including quantities, of materials procured for that programme.

Phalanx Weapon Systems

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Phalanx close-in weapon systems are in operation in the Royal Navy; and whether they are all equipped with depleted uranium bullets.

Mr. Butler: There are currently four Phalanx systems in operational use with the Royal Navy. All Phalanx close-in weapon systems are equipped with ammunition made of an alloy containing depleted uranium, the purpose of which is to increase the density, and hence the penetrating power, of the shot.

Falkland Islands Campaign

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the signals from Northwood to HMS Splendid and from HMS Splendid to Northwood over the period 28 April to 3 May 1982;

(2) if he will list the signals from Northwood to HMS Spartan and from HMS Spartan to Northwood over the period 28 April to 3 May 1982.

Mr. Stanley: No. The subject matter of these signals is classified.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the course and positions of HMS Splendid over the period 28 April to 3 May 1982;

(2) if he will list the course and positions of HMS Spartan over the period 28 April to 3 May 1982.

Mr. Stanley: The courses and positions of Her Majesty's submarines are classified.

Mr. Dalyell: asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether HMS Splendid located the Argentine carrier group between 28 April and 3 May 1982;

(2) whether HMS Spartan located the Argentine corvette group between 28 April and 3 May 1982.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Falkland Islands (Troop Transportation)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many TriStars will be available to take troops to the Falklands after the opening of the airport.

Mr. Stanley: Nine TriStar aircraft have been purchased for the RAF. Although their primary role is air-to-air refuelling, all of these aircraft would potentially be available to carry troops to the Falklands. The precise availability of aircraft at any one time will depend on many factors, including other operational priorities and the conversion and servicing programmes. The actual arrangements for the regular air trooping movements to and from the Falklands after the opening of the airport are still under consideration.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Defence what war compensation has been applied for and what amounts have been paid to the Falkland Islands Company since June 1982.

Mr. Renton: I have been asked to reply.

The Ministry of Defence, as agents for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, received a claim from the Falkland Islands Company under the compensation scheme for civil losses announced by the then Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 28 July 1982, at column 570. With the exception of one outstanding item, which is currently the subject of negotiation, the company's claim has been settled. It is not the practice to reveal details of claims, as such information is treated as "in confidence" between the Government and the claimant.

Overflying Missiles

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is Government policy to intercept and if necessary destroy missiles launched overseas which pass over the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: It is the Government's policy to take appropriate action justified in the circumstances at the time for the defence of this country.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any United Kingdom cruise missiles have flight plans which would take them over the territory of third countries not in NATO en route to their intended targets.

Mr. Stanley: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on targeting plans for nuclear weapons.

Directorate General of Defence Accounts

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he now proposes with the relevant trades unions over the report by Coopers and Lybrand on the directorate general of defence accounts.

Mr. Butler: The non-industrial trades unions have commented on the phase I report. These comments have been taken into account in preparing proposals for further study of the defence accounts organisation which are now being considered. There will be further opportunities for consultation during the progress of that further work which I hope the unions will take up. I am sorry to say, however, that it is the official policy of the non-industrial trades unions not to co-operate with this review.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the report by Coopers and Lybrand on the directorate general of defence accounts.

Mr. Butler: Yes. Copies of the report will be placed in the House of Commons Library and in the MOD Library. It will be available as an open Government document.

Civilian Payroll Operation

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what basis his Department is holding discussions with the Baric, Safe Computing and SIA companies on the future of the civilian payroll operation.

Mr. Butler: No such discussions are currently being held. Information on a routine exploratory basis had earlier been sought about software packages and bureau services available for the processing of pay accounts.

Submarines (Orders)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce his decision upon the placing of orders for type SKK 2400 submarines.

Mr. Lee: Tenders have been invited for the three boats to follow HMS Upholder but decisions have yet to be taken on the size and timing of orders.

Falkland Islands (Ministerial Flight)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the incident involving the aeroplane carrying Lord Trefgarne to the Falklands which caused it to make an unscheduled landing in Senegal.

Mr. Lee: The RAF VC10 carrying my noble Friend on the first stage of his journey to the Falkland Islands made a scheduled refuelling stop at Dakar on 6 January. Shortly after take-off the aircraft suffered a bird strike and returned to the airport so that the damage could be assessed. As repairs were necessary, the next VC10 flight was brought forward to fly out spares and take my noble Friend's party on to Ascension Island.

Argentina (Radar Contracts)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied that no contracts involving British companies and the supply of navigation and surface search radars for Argentinian MEKO 140 corvettes were signed after July 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: I am not aware that any such contracts have been signed since July 1982.

Argentina (Military Equipment)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has authorised the maintenance of Argentine military equipment by British personnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: No.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has regarding maintenance clauses in contracts involving British companies and the supply of military equipment and spare parts to Argentina; and if all such maintenance clauses were agreed upon before the Falklands conflict.

Mr. Butler: I shall reply shortly.

THE CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

St. Martin's Vicarage, Dorking

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what representations were received by the Church Commissioners as to the sale of St. Martin's vicarage, Dorking; whether they are satisfied as to the arrangements on the future relocation of the present incumbent into the Coach house, Westcott road, Dorking; and if he will make a statement as to their general policy over the sale of church property.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Commissioners have received no representations. The accomodation which will be provided as a result of the conversion of the Coach house accords with the standards currently recommended for new parsonage houses and they are satisfied that it should prove adequate for successive incumbents.

Parsonage houses are owned by individual incumbents. In co-operation with the diocesan authorities the Commissioners have, by means of grants and loans, encouraged the replacement of those parsonage houses which are costly to maintain or to occupy with houses which accord more closely to modern requirements.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax Allowances

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to transfer an element of income tax allowances from the married man's allowance to a new allowance for non-working spouses or spouses without income.

Mr. Moore: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Public Expenditure White Paper

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to publish the public expenditure White Paper.

Mr. Peter Rees: "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1985-86 to 1987-88"—Cmnd. 9428, Vol. I and II will be published at 3.30 pm on Tuesday, 22 January, and copies will be available in the Vote Office.

Civil Service Union Representatives (Facilities)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest estimates for each of the main Government Departments of the cost of facilities for elected representatives of Civil Service non-industrial unions.

Mr. Hayhoe: The estimates as at 1.6.84 are shown in the tables. Compared with the position as at 1.6.83 there has been a reduction of about 190 man years in the amount of paid time off for union business, with consequential savings (in real terms) approaching £2·0 million. These savings reflect the tighter control and accountability measures introduced by departmental agreements framed within the national agreement.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about an advance of own resources payments to the European Communities in January.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has, in accordance with article 10(2) of Council Regulation 2891/77, invited member states to advance from 20 February to 21 January payments of own resources other than VAT in respect of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties collected by the Government on their behalf in December. The Government are complying with this request, which is entirely separate from the intergovernmental agreement of 2/3 October 1984.

Pending parliamentary approval of a spring Supplementary Estimate, payment of £99 million will be made by a repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund. The payment of levies and duties on 20 February 1985 which is made directly from the Consolidated Fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972 will be reduced by the amount of the advance. There will therefore be no net addition to forecast public expenditure.

Any further requests for advances will be considered in the light of the then prevailing circumstances.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Student Unions (Use of Funds)

Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General what steps he is taking following the proposal by the students union of the Polytechnic of North London to pay £1,000 to striking miners; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Following reports that payments were likely to be made out of the funds of the North London polytechnic students' union which would be incompatible with its charitable status, I applied ex-parte to the High Court on 11 December 1984 for an injunction restraining the officers of the union from making or authorising such payments.

That application was granted; and on 14 December the court extended the injunction until 4 February 1985 or further order.

It subsequently came to my notice that there was nevertheless a risk that the funds of the union might be applied in a manner that was incompatible with the terms of the injunction. Accordingly, and in the absence of an undertaking on the part of the union officers that they would comply with the injunction, I appled on 27 December for the appointment of a receiver to safeguard those funds. The court has appointed Mr. Clive Sherling, a partner in Arthur Andersen and Co., chartered accountants, to act as receiver until after judgment in the main action, when the court is expected to rule on the legality of the disputed payments.

PRIME MINISTER

Entertainment Costs

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister what is the latest figure for the cost of entertaining at (a) Chequers and (b) 10 Downing street (i) since May 1979 and (ii) since June 1983.

The Prime Minister: The total cost of entertainment was £92,787 during the period May 1979 to December 1984 and £30,824 during the period June 1983 to December 1984. These figures cover entertainment at both Chequers and No. 10 Downing street; the information is not available by location.

Foreign Visits (Cost)

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister what is the latest figure for the cost of her foreign tours since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The total expenditure by the Prime Minister's Office on foreign tours during the period May 1979 to December 1984 is £1,992,092.

Private Office (Cost)

Mr. Skinner asked the Prime Minister what is the latest cost figure for maintaining her Private Office since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows from and including the financial year 1979-80.

*Total annual cost at outturn prices

1979-80	1,299,601
1980-81	1,614,824
1981-82†	2,303,301
1982-83	2,554,752
1983-84	2,885,042
1984-85‡	2,382,515

* Includes salaries and wages, pension liability and administration costs, but excludes any allowance for accommodation until 1983-84 when the property repayment scheme was introduced.

† The significant increase in the level of spending between 1980-81 and 1981-82 reflects the change in basis of charging by MOD for aircraft used by the Prime Minister, and also the introduction of repayment for the service staff at Chequers, previously provided as an allied service.

‡ To end of December 1984.

Engagements

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her offical engagements for Thursday 17 January.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Ivanhoe Investments Ltd.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if any Ministers were consulted by British Airways prior to the setting up of Ivanhoe Investments Ltd. in Jersey for the purpose of payments to creditors of Laker Airways.

The Prime Minister: No.

Tax Evasion

Mr. George Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will take steps to ensure that no company with a Government majority shareholding, establishes or uses any facilities in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man for the purpose of avoiding United Kingdom tax.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 16 January 1984, c. 124]: The Government expect companies controlled by the public sector to act responsibly in taxation matters. The law is the same for all United Kingdom companies whether the Government hold a majority stake in them or not, and it is for the companies concerned to ensure that the law is obeyed.

TRANSPORT

Electric Cars

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to require drivers of electric cars to pass a driving test and to hold a current driving licence; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The driver of a motor vehicle propelled by electrical power is already required to pass a driving test and to hold a current driving licence. These requirements do not, however, apply to the riders of electrically assisted pedal cycles, such as the Sinclair C5.

Motorway Lighting

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of motorway do not have warning lights; what would be the cost of providing them; and if he has considered providing them throughout.

Mrs. Chalker: All motorways have warning lights.

Parking Penalties (Verges and Pavements)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's policy concerning the penalties and offences for parking on grass verges and pavements.

Mrs. Chalker: Legislation provides for fines of up to £400 for parking illegally on footways and verges. We actively publicise the dangers and inconvenience of this selfish practice.

Helicopters

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take following the recommendation made by the helicopter airworthiness review panel on the need for the mandatory fitting of crashworthy fuel tanks in public transport helicopters.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority is statutorily responsible for setting airworthiness requirements. The authority is working with other European airworthiness authorities and with the Federal Aviation Administration of the USA with the joint aim to improve helicopter fuel tank crashworthiness requirements, taking account of the best current practices.

Helicopter Pilots (Fatigue)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is proposing to take to ensure that flight-time limitation regulations offer sufficient protection to helicopter pilots against the onset of fatigue.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The regulation of flying and duty hours performed by helicopter pilots is the responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. The current flight time limitation regulations ensure that duty and flying hours are restricted to a safe maximum. Whilst the regulations make allowances for the more arduous tasks such as repetitive short sectors, winching and carrying external loads, the CAA are investigating other special features of the North sea oil operations which, although not directly related to fatigue, may produce similar symptoms.

British Airways

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he is proposing to issue a prospectus for the sale of British Airways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There is some slippage in the plans for privatising British Airways because of the uncertainties created by the application of United States anti-trust law to air services under the Bermuda 2 aviation agreement, including the United States civil law suits following the collapse of Laker Airways. It remains my firm intention, however, to proceed with the privatisation as soon as practicable in the next financial year.

Trust Port Undertakings

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will relax Government controls over trust port undertakings.

Mr. David Mitchell: Many local enactments governing the operation of trust port undertakings contain ministerial controls and restrictions on their borrowings and related matters. These controls take no consistent form and are no longer appropriate to present day circumstances. Now that most ports (other than local authority undertakings) obtain capital for port investment from the private market, I intend this Session to seek Parliament's approval to the removal of these controls. This will allow the trust ports greater freedom of action, though statutory limits on their total borrowings will remain.

Trust ports will then be on the same footing as private sector ports.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Surplus Food

3. Mr. Canavan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total volume and value of surplus food currently stored in the United Kingdom; and what is the cost of storage.

Mr. Jopling: United Kingdom intervention stocks of beef, breadwheat, butter and skimmed milk powder on 31 December totalled 360,550 tonnes valued at some £500 million. The cost of storing and handling intervention stocks including all forms of cereals in 1983-84 was £49 million.

Processed Foods

7. Mr. Hardy asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to promote the export of British processed foods in the European Community.

Mrs. Fenner: The British food industry is already engaged in promoting its products in the Community. In this it is actively aided by Food From Britain which has identified the Benelux countries, the Federal Republic of Germany, and France as specific export markets where the promotion of a priority range of British food products is receiving support.

Halvergate Marshes

15. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money his Department has disbursed to farmers for draining land in the area of Halvergate marshes.

Mrs. Fenner: Since 1 October 1980, when the present capital grant schemes were introduced, we have paid no grant for field drainage in the Halvergate marshes. This area is, however, only a small part of a larger area known as the Halvergate levels. Since 1980 we have paid £21,500 in grant for field drainage, most of which was in this larger area.

North Sea Herring

17. Mr. Henderson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current position of negotiations between Norway and the European Economic Community over the share out of North sea herring fishing.

Mr. MacGregor: Negotiations between Norway and the Community on the share-out of North Sea herring are continuing. Meanwhile provisional quotas have been set for Community fishermen in the Community zone.

Outgoers Scheme

18. Mr. Nicholls asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the operation of the outgoers scheme as far as tenant farmers are concerned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Yes. Of the 4,826 applicants in England and Wales who originally expressed an interest in the scheme, approximately 40 per cent. were tenant farmers. So far 1,219 producers have accepted invitations to join the scheme. By the beginning of January some 540 producers had received their first year payments and 45 per cent. of these were tenants.

27. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on progress made on the outgoers scheme for dairy farmers.

Mr. Jopling: To date invitations have been sent to a total of 3,536 producers. By January 1,219 producers had decided to go out of production and they will, on a full year basis, surrender a total of 145 million litres. As other producers come to make their decisions, some will no doubt drop out thereby allowing offers to be made to others. I have no reason to suppose that we will not be able to reach our target of 289 million litres.

Straw Burning

19. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the effect of the byelaws and codes of practice relating to straw burning on the amount of straw burnt in 1984.

Mrs. Fenner: The primary purpose of the byelaws and the code of practice is to ensure that straw is burnt safely and with the minimum of nuisance to others. As my right hon. Friend said in reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) on 14 November the number of reported incidents of bad burning was much reduced in 1984.

EC (Spain and Portugal)

20. Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied that the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community will inflict no permanent damage on the United Kingdom's agricultural and horticultural industries.

Mr. Jopling: I am confident that the industries are in a position to adapt successfully during the transition period to the challenges and opportunities offered by enlargement of the Community.

Milk Quotas

21. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest position regarding the implementation of milk quotas.

Mr. Jopling: So far as the Community as a whole is concerned, I understand that all member states have made individual quotas known to their producers, with the exception of Luxembourg where there are administrative difficulties, and Italy and Greece where liability for levy is not due to be assessed until the end of the marketing year. The extent to which special cases and other administrative details have been completed varies considerably but all member states will have some problems to solve.

In the United Kingdom, the work of the local panels was completed by the end of December apart from a very few cases where there are special problems.

Most of the work of the tribunals will be completed by early February. Some 3,537 producers in the United Kingdom have now been invited to participate in the outgoers scheme and some 1,219 have committed themselves to the scheme.

Hill Areas

22. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the present state of those farming in the hill areas of Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: The past 12 months have been a difficult period of adjustment for many farmers, whether in the hills or elsewhere. However, in spite of the financial pressures on the Government we have preserved the levels of compensatory allowances for farmers in the original less favoured areas. In addition, we have introduced compensatory allowances and special rates of capital grants in the marginal lands which will provide significant help to the upland economy. We also have the needs of hill farmers very much in mind in the negotiations on the new Community structures in Brussels.

Horticultural Produce

23. Sir John Wells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to promote exports of British horticultural produce.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department provides a range of services to assist exporters of British horticultural produce. In addition, Food from Britain, which my Department funds, actively promotes sales of British horticultural produce abroad.

Liquid Milk

24. Mr. Needham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will next meet the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board to discuss liquid milk sales.

Mr. Jopling: I am in regular touch with the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board but have no specific plans to meet him at present.

Integrated Farming

25. Mr. Baldry asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made towards integrated farming and the reform of the European Economic Community structures directive to allow European Economic Community funds to be used for this purpose.

28. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made by his Department in securing European Community funds for the promotion of integrated farming schemes.

Mrs. Fenner: As we have previously informed the House, the Government have tabled amendments to the European Community's proposed agricultural structures legislation which would enable financial assistance to be given to encourage types of farming which are sympathetic to conservation in designated areas which are environmentally sensitive. I am sorry to report that our proposal has received virtually no support. Nevertheless we intend to continue to press it strongly at the next meeting of the Agriculture Council.

Livestock (Treatment)

26. Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with present standards of treatment of livestock on farms.

Mrs. Fenner: The maintenance of satisfactory standards of welfare of farm animals requires continuing effort on the part of livestock keepers. I believe that the great majority of livestock keepers do this. My Department will also continue to give priority to all aspects of its work on animal welfare.

Salmon Tagging

27. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning salmon tagging.

Mr. MacGregor: I have received representations from a number of sources about the idea of tagging salmon in order to reduce illegal fishing. As I announced last February we are examining the practical problems associated with a tagging scheme and we have been taking into account the varying views expressed to us.

Common Agricultural Policy

30. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in achieving reforms in the common agricultural policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Significant progress was made at the 1984 CAP price fixing towards containing the costs of the CAP by reducing common prices on average and by establishing a quota regime for milk at a level well below then current production. This progress was consolidated in December by the agreement on a financial guideline designed to control the growth of Community agricultural expenditure. Also in December the European Council agreed a framework for reform of the Community's wine regime.

We shall continue to press in the Community the need for sustained price restraint, including the effective application of guarantee thresholds as the best means of containing CAP costs and bringing about a better balance of supply and demand. We shall press for the effective application of the financial guideline for agriculture. At the same time we are determined to ensure that the measures taken should not discriminate against United Kindom interests.

33. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the European Economic Council of Agriculture Ministers plans to discuss the agreed financial guidelines in relation to 1985 common agricultural policy expenditure.

Mr. MacGregor: The financial guidline for agriculture will first apply to decisions taken in 1985 as they affect expenditure in 1986.

Farm Product Pricing

31. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the impact of the European Economic Community farm product pricing mechanism on the confidence of the industry.

Mr. MacGregor: We have recently consulted representatives of the industry in the context of the annual review of agriculture. They were particulary concerned that the structure of CAP prices has promoted an undesirable imbalance between returns to the arable sectors and those to most livestock sectors.

Cereals

32. Mr. Leigh asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on cereal surpluses.

Mr. MacGregor: The cereals surplus is a Community problem which must be tackled by the Community as a whole. The Government continue to believe that the right way to tackle this problem is by means of a clear and long-term policy of cereals price restraint.

Farm Produce (Marketing)

34. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will next meet the chairman of Food from Britain to discuss the marketing of British farm produce.

Mrs. Fenner: My right hon. Friend the Minister has met the chairman of Food From Britain, Mr. Saphir, on a number occasions and will continue to do so during the coming months. They discuss a wide range of topics relating to Food from Britain's responsibilities to improve the marketing of British food both at home and abroad.

Conservation

35. Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will next meet the president of the Country Landowners Association to discuss conservation matters.

Mrs. Fenner: My right hon. Friend regularly meets the president and other officers of the County Landowners Association to discuss a wide range of matters of mutual interest, including conservation.

Horses (Licensing and Identification)

36. Mr. Amess asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce legislation for the licensing and identification of horses.

Mrs. Fenner: The Ministry has no plans to introduce such legislation.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Winnick asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total tonnes of beef, butter, skimmed milk powder, and bread grain held in European Economic Community intervention stores within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jopling: United Kingdom intervention stocks at 31 December 1984 were as follows:

	Tonnes
Beef	46,740
Butter	146,620
Skimmed Milk Powder	91,425
Breadwheat	75,765

Fishing Vessels

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and amounts of decommissioning grants awarded by the European Economic Community to fishing vessel owners in the United Kingdom who have removed their fishing vessels from the United Kingdom fishing fleet and (b) the types and ports of registration of those vessels;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and types of fishing vessels which have qualified for decommissioning grants from the European Economic Community that were constructed with the aid of grants and loans from the White Fish Authority and (b) the amount of this financial assistance per vessel.

(3) if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and types of fishing vessels constructed, in the years 1979 to 1984, with the assistance of grants and loans from the Sea Fish Industry Authority and (b) the yards where they were constructed.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Telecom (Shareholders)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish figures showing the number of British Telecom shares held by shareholders whose registered addresses are in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) Northern Ireland, (d) each of the regions of England, separately, and (e) abroad.

Mr. Butcher: An analysis of British Telecom shareholders' addresses to show the number of shares held in different parts of the United Kingdom could be achieved only at disproportionate cost. However, an up-to-date register of BT shareholders will be compiled in late spring, after the shares have ceased to trade in renounceable form, and this will be available for public inspection. Overseas purchasers in the separate issues in Japan, Canada and the United States accounted for 415 million shares at the time of the offer for sale. Around 149 million shares were allocated to overseas institutions, applying as priority applicants, in the United Kingdom issue.

Class B Radio Amateurs

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why class B radio amateurs will be allowed to practise the use of morse code on 144 MHz only by arrangement with, and on payment to, the Radio Society of Great Britain; and why the normal practice of gazetting such a change has not been followed.

Mr. Butcher: A Gazette notice is only one of the ways in which an amateur licence may be varied; it is the method usually adopted where large scale and permanent amendments are required. In this case applicants are issued with a notice of variation which enables the Department to keep a record of the numbers participating in this experiment and their locations in the event of interference arising. The experiment covers all the class B amateur bands and not just 144 MHz.

The arrangement whereby the Radio Society of Great Britain issues the notices on behalf of the Secretary of State is the most cost-effective and administratively convenient. The payment by applicants of two first class postage stamps is to cover costs and postage incurred by the society.

Companies and Firms (Departmental Scrutinies)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give full details of any scrutinies or reports that his Department has been involved in concerning administrative and legislative requirements placed on companies and firms; what are their objectives; what are their scope; who is involved; if he will publish any papers relating to them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Department is leading a study within the scrutiny programme, based on fieldwork in seven Departments and interviews with business interests, of the costs borne by small businesses in complying with administrative and legislative requirements of central and local government. Decisions on publication will be taken following its completion next month.

Vosper Shiprepairers

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many bids have been received by British Shipbuilders for Vosper Shiprepairers; and how many such bids are for the whole business in its present form and how many for part only.

Mr. Butcher: I regret that I am not able to provide this commercially sensitive information. Negotiations for the sale of Vosper Shiprepairers are continuing.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date he will make an announcement about which bid for Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd. has been successful.

Mr. Butcher: British Shipbuilders hopes to agree terms for the sale of Vosper Shiprepairers before the end of February. British Shipbuilders will make an announcement after the Secretary of State has consented to a disposal.

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is or was the closing date for receipt of bids by British Shipbuilders for Vosper Shiprepairers Ltd.

Mr. Butcher: British Shipbuilders announced on 11 September 1984 that Vosper Shiprepairers was for sale. Those who then expressed an interest in acquiring the company were asked to submit bids by 2 November.

Building and Construction (Failures)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest figures relating to business failures in building and construction; and how the figures compare with each of the past five years.

Mr. Fletcher: The latest figures for insolvencies in the construction industry in England and Wales are for January/September 1984. They are as follows, together with figures for the same period of 1983 and for each of the last five complete years:

	*Bankruptcies	Company liquidations†
Years:
1979	832	789
1980	783	949
1981	922	990
1982	988	1,422
1983‡	1,180	1,776
January/September
1983	617	1,216
1984	498	1,313

* Bankruptcies relate to sole traders and partnerships.

† Compulsory and creditors' voluntary liquidations.

‡ On 1980 Standard Industrial Classification from here. Only differences from 1968 SIC used for 1979-1982 estimates is that opencast coal extraction and hiring out of contractors' plant and scaffolding are now excluded.

‖ Bankruptcy figures by industry for parts of a year are often incomplete.

Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to advertise the sale of Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell; and whether he considers them adequate to attract the best outside bids.

Mr. Butcher: The two shipyards were advertised for sale on 10 or 11 December in the Financial Times, Lloyd's List, The Times, The Daily Telegraph, The Scotsman, The Glasgow Herald and The Press and Journal. I consider that the advertising has been adequate to attract realistic bids from serious potential purchasers.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the number of days allowed from the issue by Lazard Bros. of the selling memoranda for Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell to the time when (a) serious expressions of interest had to be lodged and (b) final bids have to be registered; and whether he considers such time scales to be reasonable and in the best interests of the taxpayer.

Mr. Butcher: My right hon. Friend announced on 25 July 1984 that he had asked British Shipbuilders to sell its warship building interests, including Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell. The sale documents were first issued on 10 December and potential purchasers were asked to submit initial bids within 42 days. This period has since been extended to 67 days at the request of certain potential bidders. I consider both the original time scale, and the extension, to have been reasonable at the time and in the best interest of the taxpayer. No date has been fixed for the registration of final bids.

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information is contained within the selling memoranda for Yarrow Shipbuilders and Hall Russell issued by Lazard Bros. on behalf of Bristol Shipbuilders; and whether he considers the information contained within the memoranda is adequate to attract the best outside bids.

Mr. Butcher: The sale documents contain a description of the activities, resources and financial histories of the companies. I consider that the information contained within the documents is adequate to attract realistic bids from serious potential purchasers.

Pipes and Tubes (EC Exports)

Mr. Hickmet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether agreement has been reached between the European Commission and the United States authorities on European Economic Community exports of pipes and tubes to the United States of America.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. Agreement was reached on 10 January 1985. It covers 1985 and 1986 and provides for the European Community to have a 7·6 per cent. share of the US market. Within this, the United Kingdom share is 0·40 per cent.

The agreement represents a significant improvement on the original US quota of 5·9 per cent. However, Her Majesty's Government will monitor its application closely.

Clothing, Footwear and Textile Industries

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Industry what plans he has to increase Government investment in the British clothing, footwear and textile industries.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1985, c. 124]: Despite our representations, the proposed £20 million scheme of investment support for small firms in these industries, announced last March, still awaits clearance by the European Commission. There are no other plans to invest or to support investment in the industries; but they are eligible under assistance schemes of general application. The latest figures show that they received or were offered £25·7 million under these schemes during the period April to September 1984.

ENVIRONMENT

National Heritage Memorial Fund

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it is the policy of the National Heritage Memorial Fund to respond favourably to requests for endowments to assist the upkeep of heritage lands or buildings; and if he will list the endowments made or offered by the fund to date.

Mr. Macfarlane: Requests for endowments to assist the upkeep of heritage lands or buildings are considered alongside other requests for financial assistance in accordance with the fund's terms of reference, the resources available and priorities determined by the trustees. The following is a list of endowments given to date:

	£'s
Chelsea Physic Garden Trust
Chelsea Physic Garden, London	60,000

	£'s
National Trust:
Canons Ashby, Northamptonshire	1,000,000
Studley Royal, North Yorkshire	2,000,000
Belton House, Lincolnshire	3,825,000
Abergwesyn Common, Powys (towards cost of purchase and endownment)	100,000
National Trust for Scotland
Islands of Canna and Sanday	285,000
Hill House, Helensburgh	400,000
Blairvockie Farm, Ben Lomond	100,000
Fyvie Castle, Aberdeenshire (first instalment)	441,000
Thirlestane Castle Trust:
Thirlestane Castle, Lauder	650,000
Total paid to date	8,861,000

In addition, the fund has offered a further £879,000 to the National Trust for Scotland for the endowment of Fyvie castle in 1985-86 and 1986-87 and has committed in principle a sum of £4·48 million for the endowment of Calke abbey.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list as a percentage of the total funds spent or committed by the National Heritage Memorial Fund in each year since 1980 and the amounts spent on the following subjects (a) historic buildings and houses, (b) painting or art objects, (c) books, archives and libraries, (d) industrial archaeology, (e) scenic land and (f) scientific land, sites of special scientific interest and nature reserves.

Mr. Macfarlane: The information requested is as follows. Further details are published in the annual reports of the NHMF, which are available in the Library.

	1980-81		1981-82		1982-83		1983-84

Parish Rate

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has of parish councils levying a parish rate which puts the district council over target.

Mr. Waldegrave: Thirty-nine district and borough councils which collect precepts for parish councils are budgeting to exceed their targets in 1984-85. It is impossible to judge how they might have budgeted in the absence of those precepts.

Standard Discretionary Grants

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been paid by local authorities by way of standard and discretionary grants for each year since 1974 to the latest available date.

Sir George Young: The amounts of housing conversion and improvement, intermediate and special, and repairs grants paid by English local authorities to private owners and tenants in 1981 to 1983 and provisional figures for the first two quarters of 1984, appear in the table 2.14 of "Housing and Construction Statistics, Part 2" No. 18: figures for the earlier years are in table 7.1 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1973-83". Copies of both publications are available in the Library. Standard grants for the provision of missing amenities were replaced by intermediate grants under the 1974 Housing Act and payments of standard grants ceased in 1977.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of subsidies (a) from the Exchequer and (b) from the general rate fund to local authority housing revenue accounts for each of the years from 1975-76 to 1983-84 and the estimated expenditure for the year 1984-85.

Mr. Waldegrave: On the basis of information provided by local authorities in subsidy claim forms submitted to the Department, the available information for England is as follows. The housing subsidy system has changed during the period, so comparisons between years are of limited value.

Year	Exchequer Main Housing Subsidy £ million	Net Transfers from authorities' General Rate Fund to their Housing Revenue Account £ million
1975-76	576·7	151·9
1976-77	745·2	136·2

Merseyside Task Force

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money was spent and on what projects it was spent in each year since its inception by the Merseyside task force in Knowsley.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have made funds available from my Department's programmes to support special initiatives in Knowsley. The money has been and is being spent on a wide variety of programmes and projects aimed at helping to tackle problems in the borough. Those funds have been substantially supported by Exchequer grant and have been administered by the Merseyside task force. They resulted in an outturn of £1.12 million in 1982-83, £3.56 million in 1983-84 and an allocation, to date, of £6.65 million in 1984-85. The main schemes to benefit have been: Stockbridge village, Northwood community refurbishment scheme, Finch House estate, Knowsley and Huyton industrial estates, Prescot leisure centre and Stadt-Moers country park. The programmes concerned are ubran programme, derelict land, Housing Corporation and sports.

Council Houses (Rent Arrears)

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to change the position of women who are currently held responsible for rent arrears of council houses when a joint tenancy is ended and the woman or wife becomes the sole tenant.

Sir George Young: No. In entering into a joint tenancy agreement, the partners assume joint responsibility for discharging such obligations.

Crown Court Accommodation

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the purchase of land, buildings and chattels for use as temporary Crown court accommodation; what criteria are used; and by what means he ensures that public money is not wasted.

Sir George Young: Land, buildings and chattels for use as temporary Crown court accommodation are purchased or, as appropriate, leased by my Department sufficient to meet the requirements of the Lord Chancellor's Department. The latter take account of, inter alia, the current and estimated future numbers of Crown court cases in England and Wales and the accommodation and facilities already available. Before additional temporary (or permanent) Crown court accommodation is provided, my Department, in conjunction with the Lord Chancellor's Department, examines fully, with a financial appraisal, the possible options identified for meeting the particular requirement, including the possible use of appropriate accommodation already in Crown ownership.

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of refurbishment of property in Pocklingtons walk, Leicester, to allow the same to be used as temporary Crown court accommodation.

Sir George Young: Excluding design costs, the total cost of refurbishment of the property at Pocklingtons walk, Leicester in 1975 and 1976 for use as temporary Crown court accommodation was £185,000.

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of the acquisition of property in Pocklingtons walk, Leicester, for use as temporary Crown court accommodation.

Sir George Young: The total cost of the lease of the property at Pocklingtons walk, Leicester between 1975, and 1981 for use as temporary Crown court accommodation was £47,000.

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many buildings intended for use as Crown courts are planned to be constructed in each of the next 10 years; and if he will specify the area in which such building is planned and the individual estimated cost thereof.

Sir George Young: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many buildings intended for use as Crown courts are currently in the course of construction; and what is the estimated individual cost thereof.

Sir George Young: Including joint Crown court and county court schemes, 10 buildings for use in whole or in part for the Crown court are currently in construction. The estimated costs of these buildings, including the cost of site acquisition, are as follows:

	£ million
Birmingham	7·5
Guildford	4·9
Isleworth	3·0
Manchester (Crown and County Courts)	11·9
Nottingham	5·0
Oxford (Crown and County Courts)	5·9
Peterborough (Crown and County Courts)	3·5
Salisbury	1·8
Southampton (Crown and County Courts)	5·7
Swindon (Crown and County Courts)	2·9

Clayton Square, Liverpool

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his decision following the inquiry into compulsory purchase orders in respect of the Clayton square development in the centre of Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce his decision on the Clayton square compulsory purchase order and associated matters very soon.

Rates

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will prescribe the information to be provided by rating authorities to domestic occupiers under section 15 of the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has today laid regulations before the House prescribing the information which rating authorities are required to provide to certain domestic occupiers under section 15 of the Rates Act 1984. I hope that this will result in a valuable improvement in the accountability of local authorities to all their ratepayers.

Telford (Library)

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consent to Telford development corporation making a contribution towards a new public library in Telford.

Sir George Young: In the light of the strong representations which we have received on this subject, my right hon. Friend has decided to give his consent under section 4(4) of the New Towns Act 1981 to a contribution of not more than £400,000 by Telford development corporation to Shropshire county council towards the capital cost of providing a new business and commercial library in Telford town centre.

Hazardous Installations

Mr. Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if his Department will fund research estimating the effects of fires, explosions and the release of toxic substances on the surrounding population emanating from notifiable installations of major hazard;

(2) if his Department will fund research into fireballs from notifiable installations of major hazard;

(3) if his Department will fund research on vapour cloud explosions from notifiable installations of major hazards;

(4) if his Department will fund research on how a release of hazardous material is likely to occur from a notifiable installation and the formation of a gas cloud in close proximity to the point of escape;

(5) if his Department will fund research into factors affecting the emission of hazardous materials from notifiable installations including (a) the behaviour of flashing jets and an atmospheric entrainment into them, (b) the spread and evaporation of pools of cryogenic and non-cryogenic liquids on land and water and (c) the effectiveness of secondary containment such as bunds, ducts or catchment points on buildings.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

The Health and Safety Executive has always recognised the fundamental importance of research into aspects of risk from industrial processes. This has been endorsed by the three reports of the Health and Safety Commission's advisory committee on major hazards. A working group of the advisory committee specifically considered research needs and priorities.

Within the executive, the research and laboratory services division devotes a substantial proportion of resources to research into "major hazard" and "environmental" issues. The executive also funds extra mural research on major hazard issues. Total expenditure of RLSD in 1983-84 was £14·8 million, of which about a quarter is devoted to research project work. RLSD and other parts of the executive are deeply involved in large-scale trials (costing over £1·7 million) on heavy gas dispersion at Thorney island, a programme of work which is jointly supported by a large group of British and international sponsors.

The major hazards assessment unit of HSE also has a contractual arrangement with the safety and reliability directorate of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority which includes research into certain aspects of risk associated with major hazards. All the aspects of research listed in the questions are, or will be, covered by current or planned research efforts which are continually under review as further information arises.

The results of this research are widely available and will form an important input into the work arising from the recently introduced Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations.

Related research work is also carried out by industry, and the executive is also deeply involved in such research as part of the research programme of the European Community.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Crown Agents Premises, Millbank

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with the Crown Agents concerning its proposed disposal of its Millbank headquarters building.

Mr. Raison: I informed the House on 23 February 1984 at column 991 that the Board of the Crown Agents intended to sell its offices in Millbank. The offices were put on the market in the normal way and Crown Agents kept my Department informed on developments leading to acceptance of the offer made by Raleigh Enterprises Ltd.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Overseas Visits

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries he intends to visit in the next six months.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have firm plans to visit Belgium, Bulgaria, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Luxembourg, France, Portugal, Romania, Switzerland and Turkey. Some of these visits are for bilateral purposes. Others are on multilateral business. I also have certain other visits in mind for which the plans are not yet firm.

Embassies

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the average costs of running an embassy (a) in Europe, (b) in Asia, (c) in Africa and (d) in North and South America; and if he will break down the figures involved.

Mr. Renton: In the financial year 1983-84 the costs of the embassies and high commissions concerned were as follows:

Ugandan Asians (Compensation)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he plans to meet the President of Uganda to discuss compensation for Asians now resident in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Renton: We are regularly in touch with the Uganda Government about these claims. Our High Commissioner in Kampala last discussed them with the responsible Uganda Minister on 9 January. Some progress has been made. The Uganda Government have told us that over 50 claims have been settled. Our High Commissioner expressed our strong concern that outstanding claims should be dealt with as quickly as possible.

Law of the Sea

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he has had with the Bonn Government about a European Economic Community policy towards the law of the sea treaty.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have frequent discussions with the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, as with those of other Member States of the EC, on many aspects, including Community aspects, of the law of the sea as well as the UN Law of the Sea Convention. These consultations are confidential.

Women (Discrimination)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any decision has yet been taken on ratification of the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Renton: We are still considering this convention in the light of our existing legislation and hope to be in a position to make an announcment about ratification soon.

Women's Rights (Conference)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any decision has yet been made as to who will represent the United Kingdom at the United Nations conference on women's rights in Nairobi in 1985.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend on 12 December 1984 at column 522.

Falkland Islands (Exploration Grants)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what protest has been received from Argentina about exploration grants in the Falklands given to Firstland Oil and Gas; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Renton: We have received no communications from the Argentine Government. A letter from the Argentine permanent mission to the Secretary General of the United Nations on Falklands oil exploration has been circulated to all members of the United Nations and we are considering our response to it.

Vietnamese Refugees (Hong Kong)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Vietnamese refugees are held in open and closed camps, respectively, in Hong Kong; what is the average length of time and the longest period, respectively, that refugees have been kept in closed camps under penal supervision; what effort has been made to settle refuges in other countries and to unite families; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: A total of 5,899 Vietnamese refugees are currently accommodated in open centres, and 6,018 in closed centres in Hong Kong. Those in closed centres are not under "penal supervision". The average length of stay in a closed centre is 17 months, and the longest stay so far is 30 months. We maintain a continuing dialogue with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other countries in order to find permanent solutions for all the refugees who are at present in Hong Kong. We are most concerned about this problem and will continue to make every effort to solve it.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what review of Government policy on Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong has taken place since the treaty with China over the future of the colony; and if he will indicate the steps which have been taken under the treaty to safeguard the interests of stateless persons and political refugees.

Mr. Renton: Our policy on Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong is kept under constant review. In the case of Vietnamese refugees the relevant legislation is the Hong Kong Immigration Ordinance, which contains a special provision under which Vietnamese refugees may be allowed to remain in Hong Kong pending their resettlement elsewhere. Under the terms of the agreement on the future of Hong Kong the ordinance, unless amended, or unless it conflicts with the basic law, will remain in force after 30 June 1997. The Agreement also provides that the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights as applied to Hong Kong shall remain in force.

WALES

Education Projects

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the publication date for education projects B6, B7, B8 and B9, financed by his Department.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The main reports of the assessment of performance unit to date have been published as follows:

Education Projects B6, B7, B8 and B9

English Language	Primary	No. 1 September 1981	No. 2 September 1982	3rd Report May 1984
	Secondary	No. 1 March 1982	No. 2 January 1983

	Age 13	No. 1 September 1982	No. 2 March 1984
	Age 15	No. 1 December 1982	No. 2 April 1984

A report on Project B9 was published in 1983.

Behaviour and Learning Problems

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the publication date of the B5 project, financed by the Welsh Office on behaviour and learning problems in South Wales schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No date has been decided.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many persons were (a) registered as unemployed, (b) registered as unemployed for more than one year and (c) registered as unemployed for more than two years for each of the counties in Wales in January of each year since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is available in the House of Commons Library.

Field Monument Wardens

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) why no reference to the Welsh language was included in the list of qualifications required for the posts of field monument wardens in Wales;

(2) what steps he has taken to ensure that candidates for the six posts of field monument wardens in Wales possess a good command of the Welsh language.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: It is not essential for field monument wardens to be able to speak Welsh although it would be an advantage for those based in the predominantly Welsh speaking areas, given the nature of the duties involved. This factor will fully be taken into account in selecting candidates for appointment.

Departmental Appointments

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ensure that the linguistic situation in Wales is taken into consideration when appointments to his Department are made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Yes. The guiding principle with appointments to posts in all parts of the Civil Service is that the best available candidate should be selected. This is, however in no way inconsistent with giving appropriate weight in the selection process to ability to speak Welsh in cases where this would be an advantage in undertaking the duties of the post concerned taking account of the linguistic situation in Wales.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what contribution his Department and the various bodies in Wales for which he has responsibility will be making to Exercise Brave Defender.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: None.

Notifiable Installations

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he is satisfied that people living near to notifiable installations of major hazards are adequately informed of the nature of the hazards which might affect them if control measures fail;

(2) if he is satisfied that people living near to notifiable installations of major hazards are adequately informed of what they should do in a major incident;

(3) if he is satisfied that people living near to notifiable installations of major hazards are adequately informed of the emergency arrangements which have been made in advance.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

Under the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations, those people in the vicinity of installations where there is the greatest risk of a major accident must be informed by 1 January 1986 of the nature of the activity taking place, its associated hazards and what to do in an emergency.

Local emergency planning procedures have operated for some time, but the Government regard the new legislative arrangements as an important plank in the statutory framework for dealing with the consequences of industrial accidents. While there can be no complacency about the risk of major accidents, the arrangements are in line with the recommendations made by the Health and Safety Commission's Advisory Committee on Major Hazards in its various reports and will be subject to review. To this extent, the present position is regarded as satisfactory. It will be kept under review.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those liaison committees that exist for notifiable installations of major hazards.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply. As there is no statutory requirement for liaison committees to be established the information requested is not available.

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, for the most recent available date, for each local authority area in Wales, the number of notifiable installations constituting a major hazard.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

By the end of December 1984 the numbers of installations notified to the Health and Safety Executive under the Notification of Installations Handling Hazardous Substances Regulations 1982 for each county in Wales were as follows:

	Number
Clwyd	13
Dyfedd	14
Gwent	18
Gwynedd	10
Mid-Glamorgan	16
Powys	4
West-Glamorgan	23

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Allan Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give details of the capital expenditure by each of the Welsh county councils for each of the last five years, since 1979, shown separately under the following heads: education, social services, highways and transportation, fire services, environment and economic development.

Mr. Nicolas Edwards [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 24.]: The information is as follows:

NORTHERN IRELAND

Itinerants

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the present estimate of the number of itinerants in Northern Ireland;

(2) what is the estimated percentage of itinerants in Northern Ireland who were born in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: At the last count made in June 1984 there were some 680 itinerant men, women and children in Northern Ireland. Of these, it is estimated that 28 per cent. were born in the Republic of Ireland, the majority having resided in Northern Ireland for more than 16 years.

Students (Dental Treatment)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students over 18 years of age apply for dental treatment, for dentures or for alterations or additions to dentures; how many claim for exemption on grounds of low income; how many such applications are granted; and what is (a) the cost of collecting fees from such students and (b) the administrative cost of processing all the claims.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is not available.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Food Purchases (Medical Aspects)

Q100. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that all Government purchases of food are in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Food.

Mr. John Patten: The recommendations from the Chief Medical Officer's committee on medical aspects of food policy are concerned with nutrient intake. My right hon. Friend has asked the British Nutrition Foundation and the Health Education Council that their joint advisory committee on nutrition education turn the COMA advice as soon as possible into practical guidelines. When these appear they will be brought to the attention of all government and public bodies which have a responsibility for catering and dietetics.

Solihull Hospital

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to visit Solihull hospital.

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend will be aware that a scheme to develop Solihull hospital at a cost of £22 million at current prices is scheduled to start in late 1988. We have no plans to visit the hospital at present.

Departmental Staff (Blind Persons)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many registered blind people have been employed in his Department for each of the last four years.

Mr. Newton: The information is not available centrally.

Invalidity Benefit

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest available figures for (a) the total number of invalidity pensioners, (b) how many invalidity pensioners are also in receipt of supplementary benefit, (c) the estimated savings resulting from the move to pay invalidity benefit fortnightly in arrears and (d) the estimated net cost, or saving of each of the proposed changes to invalidity benefit, namely, the restoration of the abatement and the restriction on the entitlement, of both invalidity allowance and the earnings-related component.

Mr. Newton: (a) The total number of invalidity pensioners as at 2 April 1983, the latest date for which information is available, was 737,000. (b) The total number of invalidity pensioners receiving supplementary benefit as at 9 December 1982, the latest date for which information is available, was 27,000*. (c) Details of the savings from paying invalidity pensioners fortnightly in arrears have yet to be finalised. (d) The net cost in a full year in 1985-86 terms of restoring the abatement of invalidity benefit is estimated to be £60 million. The net savings in a full year in 1985-86 terms of the restriction on entitlement to both invalidity allowance and additional component are estimated at £25 million allowing for transitional protection for existing beneficiaries.

* Invalidity Trap: Changes to the qualifying rules for supplementary benefit in May 1983 benefited an estimated 25,000 sick and disabled people aged 60 or over. Further changes in November 1983 completely removed the trap, helping an estimated further 30,000 to qualify for supplementary benefit. I regret that precise information on how many took advantage of the changes is not available.

Alcohol Abuse

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many premature deaths due to alcohol consumption or accidents associated with alcohol abuse have occurred in 1984; and how these figures compare with those in 1980 and in each year since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: The requested information is not available centrally but the hon. Member may find the information in the table helpful. Deaths from motor vehicle accidents are not shown in the table but it is estimated that about one road death in five (ie about 1,000 a year in England and Wales) occurs in accidents where at least one person had consumed alcohol over the legal limit.

England and Wales — Number of deaths

† Industrial action by registration officers in 1981 meant that some of the information normally requested to aid coding by cause of death was unavailable. In addition information normally supplied by coroners was not available.

‡ First two quarters only.

[These deaths are included in the table as some of them are thought to be associated with excessive drinking.

Statutory Sick Pay Scheme

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library the evidence he has collected on the attitude of employers towards the statutory sick pay scheme.

Mr. Newton: There have been some independent reports of employers' reactions to the statutory sick pay scheme, such as that by Income Data Services Ltd which the hon. Member may already have seen. In addition, the Department receives feedback through its frequent contacts with employers and their representatives. More recently we have issued a consultative document on the proposed changes to the scheme, on which we are awaiting comments. This has been placed in the Library.

The social security policy inspectorate are completing an inquiry into statutory sick pay and I hope to be able to place their report in the Library next week. The emerging conclusions from the report suggest that a significant majority of employees preferred statutory sick pay to sickness benefit. Statutory sick pay is regarded as more convenient and most employees preferred to receive their benefit from their employer, but about 40 per cent. of the employees interviewed thought that more information should be provided about the scheme.

Correspondence

Mr. Forrester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is now in a position to reply to the correspondence from the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North sent on 8 March concerning mobility allowance for the late husband of Mrs. Barbara Mosedale of 2 Fielden Close, Norton, Stoke-on-Trent.

Mr. Newton: I have written to the hon. Member, and regret the delay which has occurred.

Cost Rent Scheme

Dr. Owen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the effect of the extension of the value added tax to building alterations and extensions on the cost rent scheme facility for general practitioners;

(2) why it is not possible to include value added tax in the schedules of the cost rent scheme facility for general practitioners;

(3) if he will increase the limits of the cost rent scheme for general practitioners in order to accommodate the effect of putting value added tax on building alterations and extensions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We considered very carefully the question of increasing these cost allowances to take account of the imposition of VAT on building alterations and decided that the existing allowances should be made inclusive of VAT with effect from 1 June 1984. Taking the country as a whole, the cost rent scheme is already generous and faced with competing demands for resources within the NHS we have to consider where our priorities should lie. We have agreed that VAT may be added to the existing cost limits for those doctors who undertook to modify their surgery premises before the imposition of VAT was announced on 13 March 1984, but we can see no compelling reason otherwise to increase the cost limits to cover a change in taxation. These arrangements will however be kept under review.

The effect of these developments on the cost rent scheme cannot be predicted with any confidence. They may lead some doctors either to modify projects so that building costs and VAT can be met within the existing cost limits or to make less substantial alterations to their surgery premises under the improvement grant scheme.

Infant Mortality

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births in (a) England, (b) Japan, (c) France, (d) Finland and (e) Sweden for the years 1980, 1982 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: The information is not available for 1984. The figures for 1980 and 1982 are shown in the table:

Infant Mortality Rates for Selected Countries, 1980 and 1982

	Infant mortality rates per 1,000 live births Year
Country	1980	1982
England	12·0	10·8
Japan	7·5	6·6
France	9·8	9·5
Finland	7·6	6·0
Sweden	6·9	6·8

Great care should be taken in comparing the figures for different countries as there may be differences in the definitions of infants at risk.

Poverty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what definition of poverty is used in the European Economic Community programme to combat poverty.

Mr. Whitney: For the purposes of the Council decision on specific Community action to combat poverty

> "the poor are taken to mean persons, families and groups of persons whose resources (material, cultural and social) are so limited as to exclude them from the minimum acceptable way of life in the Member States in which they live"

(Article 1.2 of Council document 85/8EEC).

Efficiency Incentive Payments

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total value of efficiency incentive payments made to offices in his Department in 1984; if he will list the categories of savings which qualified for such incentives; and if he will list the offices to which such payments were awarded, showing the amount of the payment and the use to which it was put in each office under the following categories: office parties, staff outings and social purposes, purchases of equipment, purchases of vouchers for use by staff and donations to charities.

Mr. Whitney: The Department's efficiency incentive scheme achieved administrative savings of £121,036. During the financial year 1983-84 in the following categories; telecommunications, office supplies and equipment, postage, travelling expenses, office works and services and improvements in administrative procedures.

Awards totalling £28,073.36 were made to the offices listed:

Information is not available on how individual offices disposed of awards and it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. It is known however that the majority of funds were donated to local office sports and social club funds to be used for the benefit of the staff.

The Department also operates an incentive scheme which rewarded good or improved overall performance in local offices; bonus payments of £139,513·88 were made during 1984.

National Health Service (Contracts)

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the total value of National Health Service contracts for each of the years 1978 to 1984 on (a) intravenous infusion fluids, (b) irrigation fluids, (c) topical fluids and (d) introperitoneal dialysis fluids.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is not available. Arrangements for the supply of these fluids are made by health authorities and we do not collect detailed local information centrally.

Abortion

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which district and regional health authorities had agency agreements for abortions in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this information.

Secure Places

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many secure places for boys under 17 years of age are available in England and Wales; and what has been the average rate of occupancy during the most convenient recent 12 month period.

Mr. John Patten: Secure accommodation is generally available for young people up to the age of 18 years. On 1 January 1985 there were 362 approved secure places in the community homes system in England and Wales of which 162 were for boys and 141 for young people of either sex. Information about the average rate of occupancy is not currently available, but on 31 March 1984 there were 241 young people accommodated of whom 196 were boys. More comprehensive information from a new statistical return introduced on 1 April 1984 will be available in mid-1985.

Secure places are also available for young people of either sex at two youth treatment centres provided by the Department. On 1 January 1985 there were 58 such places, accommodating 37 boys and 8 girls.

Surrogate Motherhood

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to introduce legislation dealing with surrogate motherhood during the current parliamentary Session.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 14 January at column 63.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the number of agencies arranging surrogate motherhood on a commercial basis in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are aware of only one agency arranging surrogate pregnancies in this country, the Surrogate Parenting Centre of Great Britain.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has issued any guidelines to health authorities concerning the handling of cases involving surrogate motherhood.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

In Vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to introduce legislation dealing with in vitro fertilisation during the current parliamentary Session.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 14 January at column 63.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown by month of notification of all new cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome since the disease was first reported in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is collected centrally on a quarterly basis. The information is as follows:

Quarterly period	1	2	3	4	Total
1979	—	—	—	1	1
1980	—	—	—	—	—
1981	1	—	—	4	5
1982	3	2	1	7	13
1983	3	4	4	4	15
1984	12	11	30	21	74
				Total	108

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the current cases of acquired immune deficiency syndrome are believed to have resulted from the use of blood donated by individuals who were carrying the disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Three cases have occured in patients with haemophilia who had been treated with blood products. No cases have resulted from blood transfusion itself.

Adult (Prescriptions)

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he takes to ensure that medicines for the use of adults are not included on children's presciption forms to avoid incurring the relevant prescription charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Paragraph 36 of the terms of service for doctors requires a doctor to use a separate prescription form for each patient except where a doctor is prescribing in bulk for a school or institution. If a suspected breach of the terms of service were brought to the attention of the relevant family practitioner committee a doctor would be liable to proceedings under the service committee and tribunal regulations.

Attendance allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give, for the last 12-month period for which figures are available, the number of successful claimants for attendance allowance who received their order book; 1 to 4 weeks, 4 to 8 weeks, 8 to 12 weeks, 12 to 16 weeks, 16 to 20 weeks, 20 to 24 weeks, 24 to 28 weeks, 28 to 32 weeks, and more than 32 weeks after receipt of their claim.

Mr. Newton: At the first week in September 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, the average time taken to clear an attendance allowance claim from receipt to dispatch of an order book was 10 weeks. I regret that it is not possible to provide a detailed breakdown of this figure.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how long it takes on average for his Department to answer correspondence from hon. Members.

Mr. Fowler: It is not possible to give a realistic average, as the time taken to reply depends on whether it is necessary for the Department to seek local information about the particular case. Most letters, however, are replied to within four weeks

Special Investigation Branch (Dundee)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the special investigation branch has been sent to Dundee on two occasions in the current year.

Mr. Whitney: Specialist claims control teams visit each local office on a cyclical basis as part of a planned programme. Within that programme, the Dundee, West office was visited in July-August 1984 and a visit to the Dundee, East office commenced on 7 January.

Pregnancies (Statistics)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for information on the numbers of pregnancies achieved each year by artificial insemination by donor and by in vitro fertilisation to be collected centrally by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I see limited practical value at present in the special collection of these statistics.

Prescription and Dental Charges

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the average annual amounts paid by adults of working age in respect of (a) National Health Service dental charges and (b) National Health Service prescription charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is estimated that the average annual amounts paid by adults of working age in 1983 in respect of dental charges was £4·72 and in respect of prescription charges was £3·42.

Limited List Prescribing

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to meet the chairman of the British Medical Association to discuss his proposals about the limited list of drugs to be available under the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. Friend and I have met the chairman and members of the British Medical Association's general medical services committee on a number of occasions to discuss the limited list. The chairman of council of the British Medical Association has now also sought a meeting with us and this will be arranged as soon as possible.

Stillborn Babies

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to give parents the right to name a stillborn baby and for a specific place for a first name to be provided on the register of stillborn, the birth (stillbirth) certificate and the burial certificate.

Mr. John Patten: Recent instructions to registrars of births and deaths require them to ask parents attending for stillbirth registration whether they have chosen a name for their baby and whether they wish the name to be recorded in the stillbirth register.

Any name recorded is shown in the space numbered 1 in the register entry and is then copied onto the certificate of registration, the certificate for burial or cremation, and on any certified copy issued.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the most recent estimated cost of extending invalid care allowance to married and cohabitating women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We estimate that the net cost of extending invalid care allowance to married women at November 1984 rates would be about £85 million a year. We have no present plans to do so.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a list of family practitioner committees and the district health authorities to which they each relate.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Spectacles

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special provisions he intends to make to reduce the cost of spectacles for cataract sufferers who require high powered complex lenses.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's policy of encouraging great competition and choice has produced lower prices across the whole range of private spectacles.

However, fears were expressed at the time of the ending of the opticians former monopoly that the cost of more powerful or complex lenses might rise. We did not accept these forecasts, but, as a form of reassurance to cataract sufferers and others who require certain of the more powerful or complex lenses currently supplied through the general ophthalmic services and who do not qualify for full or partial remission of charges, we intend to make special provisions to give them the option of obtaining them through the GOS at charges which reflect the cost of the lenses and their dispensing. We are consulting interested bodies on this and other proposed arrangements for future general ophthalmic services.

Cancer (Cumbria)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will retabulate the wards in table 2.18 of the Black report, ranking them by probability using a Poisson distribution, and identify those wards on the Cumbrian coast; and if he will make a statement on the differences in ranking obtained by using probability and not rate of incidence as used in table 2.18 of the Black report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. The Poisson probability is set against the wards listed in both tables 2.18 and 2.19 in the report of the independent advisory group chaired by Sir Douglas Black.

Ranking by incidence lists first those wards where the proportion of children registered with cancer had been highest. Ranking by probability lists first those wards for which the difference between the observed rate for a ward and that for the region as a whole (or a greater difference) could most easily have arisen by chance. Both sets of statistics should be considered together. The difference is discussed in a letter published in "Nature" for 1 November 1984 by Dr. M. J. Gardner, a member of the independent advisory group.

I shall write to the hon. Member concerning the identity of the wards.

Benefits

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total amount of benefit claimed by, and in respect of, unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds in Wales.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to the reply, 14 January 1985, c. 27]: I have been asked to reply.

I regret that a separate figure for Wales is not available.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Clinical Research

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the level of funding of clinical research in hospitals.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. It is for the Council to decide on the distribution of the resources available to it between the various areas of medical research, including clinical research in hospitals. Clinical research is also supported by hospitals and universities, the latter using part of the funds allocated to them for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee.

I understand that, within the resources it has, the council wishes both to maintain its commitment to clinical research, taking into account the level of support available from universities and hospitals, and to invest in outstanding research opportunities which the council has identified.

Tropical Medicine Research

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the level of funding of tropical medicine research; and what conveniently available figures he has for the funding of tropical medicine research from 1978 to 1984.

Mr. Brooke: The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. I understand that the expenditure by the council in the field of tropical medicine research between 1978 and 1984, including both grant-in-aid funds and funds provided by, and administered on behalf of, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, was as follows:

Financial Year	£000 (cash)
1978-79	3,692
1979-80	4,847
1980-81	5,878
1981-82	6,718
1982-83	7,618
1983-84	8,388
1984-85	N/A
	See below

It is for the council to decide on the distribution of the resources available to it between research in the various areas of medical science, including tropical medicine research. I understand that the reduction in the recurrent expenses budgets of the council's units for 1984-85, which was implemented early in the present financial year, affected the units engaged in tropical medicine research equally with MRC's other units.

Tropical medicine research is also supported by universities and medical schools using funds allocated for teaching and research on the advice of the University Grants Committee. No figures are available. The voluntary charities also fund valuable work in this area.

University Grants Committee (Tenure)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will publish the advice given by the University Grants Committee on tenure, or deposit a copy of the advice in the Library.

Mr. Brooke: The UGC's advice on tenure and related matters will be published next week, and copies will be placed in the Library.

No-area Pooling System

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the amounts paid to each local education authority in respect of the no-area pooling system in each year since 1980 and the total cost of the system in each of these years.

Mr. Dunn: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many local education authority claims for money under the no-area pooling system have been refused, or amended in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Claims are now certified as correct by the chief financial officer of each authority. The Department makes only arithmetical checks upon them. For years up to 1981-82 claims were examined by the district auditor; any amendments to them were made by the auditor and the Department was not usually aware of them. The secretariat of the pooling committee gives advice to authorities on request about which items would properly fall to be claimed under the regulations.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the amount payable per traveller child per year under the no-area pooling system for each year since 1980 (a) in respect of primary education and (b) in respct of secondary education.

Mr. Dunn: The rates at which local education authorities can pool their tuition costs for travelling pupils in ordinary classes are as follows:

(£ per annum)

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Primary	644	744	778	806	865
Secondary—under 16	874	1,004	1,026	1,105	1,163
Secondary—over 16	1,403	1,623	1,606	1,673	1,765

Where special provision is made, 75 per cent. of actual costs may be pooled if this is greater than the preceding figures.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the projected budget for the no-area pooling system for the academic year 1985-86; and if he will break this budget down into its constituent parts.

Mr. Dunn: The estimated pool claims of English local education authorities in 1985-86 for the education of no-area pupils are as follows:

	£ million (cash)
Tuition costs—primary, middle, secondary and further education	13·7
Tuition costs—nursery, special and adult	2·0
All costs of travelling pupils and refugees	3·9
All other costs	2·2
TOTAL	21·8

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he satisfies himself that the money paid to local education authorities under the no-area pooling system has been spent on enhancing the education of travellers' children.

Mr. Dunn: Advice from the secretariat of the pooling committee combined with the normal local authority audit procedures are aimed at ensuring that all the items claimed properly fall to be claimed under the Regulations.

The advice of Her Majesty's Inspectorate, based on surveys of provision for traveller pupils conducted in 14 authorities over recent years, is that the no-area pool has been instrumental in encouraging some authorities to launch important initiatives aimed at meeting the particular educational needs of traveller children.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied that the no-area pooling system encourages the integration of travellers's children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities may seek reimbursement from the no-area pool in respect of all kinds of provision made for the education of travellers' children. The pooling arrangements neither encourage nor militate against the integration of such children into the mainstream classroom.

School Curriculum

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, in view of the fact that the subject of classics in the school curriculum is not mentioned in his Department's discussion paper, "The Organisation and Content of the 5-16 Curriculum", he will clarify the answer of 17 December 1984, Official Report, column 10, to the hon. Member for Gosport, in which it was said that the place of classics in the school curriculum was also raised in that discussion paper.

Mr. Dunn: I refer my hon. Friend to paragraph 21 of "The Organisation and Content of the 5-16 Curriculum", which refers to the place of classics in the context of foreign languages teaching in schools.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the talks on the structure of teachers' pay.

Sir Keith Joseph: At the last meeting of the Burnham salary structure working party on 5 December, the teachers' panel rejected the employers' proposals and withdrew from further discussion.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Londonderry (District Council)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has yet made a decision about the future of local government in Londonderry city and district following the one-year-old boycott of the present district council by all its Unionist members; whether he has considered the appointment of a commission to replace the boycotted council; whether he has considered the suggestion of two district councils on either side of the River Foyle; and if he is yet in a position to make a statement which would contribute to a resolution of the present boycott and impasse.

Mr. Chris Patten: The absence of some members from meetings of Derry city council is regrettable, but the Government have no plans to interfere in the running of the council, which has continued to exercise its functions as prescribed by the Local Government Act (Northern Ireland) 1972.

The final recommendations of the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner, who reported in 1984, have been accepted without modification and given statutory effect. The commissioner did not recommend any alteration in the number or boundaries of local government districts in the area and it is not proposed to make any change in the number of local government districts.

WALES

Outgoers Scheme

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the criteria employed by his Department in selecting Welsh milk producers for the outgoers scheme.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Under the outgoers scheme priority is being given, in Wales as in England, to the smaller producer who depends mainly upon dairying for his basic income.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the amount in million litres per full year of the offers so far made by Welsh milk producers under the outgoers scheme; what percentage of the quota for Wales this amount was; and how this amount relates to the planned targets in litres for Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: 100·7 million litres per year was provisionally offered by milk producers in Wales. The milk quota is set on an England and Wales basis at 12,843 million litres. The aim is to buy in 2·25 per cent. of this total, amounting to 288·98 million litres.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many producers in Wales have so far come forward under the outgoers compensation scheme for milk production.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Seven hundred and twelve.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many milk producers in Wales who came forward with offers under the outgoers scheme received first invitations; how many and on what basis, tranches of how many litres, received further invitations; and how many received the last batch of invitations.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is as follows:

Tranche	Applicants in Wales	Size category litres	Quota million litres
1	557	under 200,000	46·5
2	41	200,001-250,000	9·2
3	16	250,001-275,000	4·3
4	23	275,001-325,000	6·8

Heavy Lorries

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest readily available figures for the proportion of heavy lorries checked and found to be above the legal weight limit in (a) Wales and (b) each county in Wales.

Mrs. Chalker: I have been asked to reply.

The latest readily available figures are contained in the annual reports of the licensing authorities for the year ending 30 September 1983. They are as follows:

	Number
Vehicles checked	25,383
Vehicles weighed	4,660
Vehicles found to be overloaded	366

The figures cover the Principality. Separate figures for each Welsh county are not available.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Murder (Statistics)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out in a table a statistical analysis of the sentences passed on those found guilty of murder in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Information on all persons convicted of murder is published in table 4.8 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9349).

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been charged with murder in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the number of persons indicted for murder is published in table 4.7 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9349).

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been found guilty of murder in each of the last five years; and, in each year, how many of those convicted had a family relationship with the deceased.

Mr. Mellor: The information available is summarised in the following table:

Persons found guilty of homicide by relationship to victim

	England and Wales
	1979	1980	1981	1982	*1983

Total	475	422	445	436	301

* As at 1 June 1984; figures for 1983 are incomplete.

Drunkenness (Conviction Statistics)

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions there were in each of the years 1981 to 1984 for offences involving drunkenness.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested was published in table 1 of the annual Home Office statistical bulletin on "Offences of Drunkenness" (issue 16/84), a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Manslaughter (Statistics)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been unlawfully killed in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: Information on the number of offences initially and currently recorded by the police as homicide is published in table 4.1 of "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, 1983" (Cmnd. 9349).

General Election (Proxy Votes)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can analyse the proxy votes cast at the last general election according to their respective qualification, such as service, merchant seamen, other employment, and so on.

Mr. Mellor: No. This information is not held centrally, and there is no obligation for the registration officer to record it.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any of the 13 prisoners who committed suicide in penal establishments in 1983, and who were not under any form of special observation at that time, had been identified as a suicide risk.

Mr. Mellor: Of the 13 prisoners who were not under any form of special observation at the time of their suicide, six had papers marked with an "F" to denote a suicide risk. Following the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons on suicides in prison, the "F" marking system is under review.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusion he has reached following the close inspection undertaken by his Department of ways to dissuade people from drug misuse and abuse, referred to in his speech to the London Diplomatic Association on 14 December 1983.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health has since announced that the Government intend to launch a major education and prevention campaign directed at parents and young people. The ministerial group on the misuse of drugs is urgently considering the form of the campaign, taking into account information derived from market research commissioned by the Government.

Cable Authority

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals are employed by the Cable Authority; and what projections of the future employment needs of the authority exist.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Cable Authority is responsible for setting its own staffing levels. The authority's intention is, I understand, to recruit about 15 staff. The authority this week announced, as a first step, the appointment of a director-general.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil servants were employed in P3 division in December 1984.

Mr. Mellor: On 31 December 1984 there were 59½ civil servants in post in P3 division, 13 in the division's category A section.

Unconvicted Prisoners

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unconvicted prisoners had been provisionally put in category A on 31 December 1984.

Mr. Mellor: As at 31 December 1984, there were 146 prisoners provisionally in category A.

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are currently made for work by unconvicted prisoners who have been provisionally put in category A at Winson Green prison in Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: No work is available for these prisoners.

PRIME MINISTER

Race Relations Act

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will review the list of public bodies which under section 75 of the Race Relations Act and Statutory Instrument No. 218, 1984, are exempt from the other provisions of the Race Relations Act; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: This list of bodies "prescribed" under section 75(5) of the Act is reviewed from time to time. Prescription does not authorise the bodies to discriminate in their employment policies other than to restrict employment to those meeting the nationality requirements for the service of the Crown. These requirements are widely drawn to include not only British citizens but also Commonwealth citizens and citizens of the Irish Republic. Most states operate similar rules and our practice is probably more liberal than most in not restricting entry to British citizens and in applying the rules to a relatively small area of the public service as a whole.

Ombudsman (Administration)

Mr. Waller asked the Prime Minister if she will now seek to implement the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration by introducing amending legislation to bring personnel matters arising from employment in the public service within his jurisdiction.

The Prime Minister: No. I see no reason at present to depart from the view of successive Administrations that the commissioner was not established to investigate relations between the state as employer and its employees.

VE Day

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister how many representations have been received calling for a commemorative ceremony for the 40th anniversay of Victory in Europe Day.

The Prime Minister: Nine letters from Members of Parliament and members of the public have been received. In addition, I note that hon. Members have put down a number of early-day motions on this matter.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister what information she has as to how France and the Benelux countries are celebrating the 40th anniversary of Victory in Europe Day.

The Prime Minister: The French Government will celebrate the 40th anniversary of the allied victory in Europe with ceremonies stressing the themes of peace and reconciliation. The Luxembourg Government envisage a small parade and the laying of wreaths at war cemetaries. I am not aware of any plans for an official commemoration by the Governments of Belgium or the Netherlands.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will make any funds available for a commemorative celebration of the 40th anniversary of Victory in Europe Day.

The Prime Minister: As I said in the House on 15 January, at column 180, we are considering the form of a national commemoration and will make an announcement in due course.

Nuclear Fuel (Reprocessing)

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister what are the economics of reprocessing spent nuclear fuel in the United Kingdom; and what would be the impact on the civil and military nuclear programmes if such reprocessing were stopped.

The Prime Minister: The only thermal reactor fuel currently being reprocessed in the United Kingdom is that from Magnox power stations. Since none of the stations, except Wylfa, has stores capable of holding the fuel for more than a limited period, reprocessing is a technical necessity. Cessation would entail closing the Magnox power stations, with very significant costs to the electricity consumer. As far as oxide fuel is concerned, the timing of and commitment to reprocessing through the proposed THORP facility at Sellafield is a commercial matter for the CEGB and the SSEB.

Spent fuel from CEGB and SSEB reactors is not reprocessed for the defence programme.

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister what will be the lead Department for the forthcoming review of the non-proliferation treaty; and if she is satisfied that the United Kingdom has adequately discharged all its obligations under that treaty.

The Prime Minister: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office will be the lead Department for the forthcoming review conference of the treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons. The United Kingdom continues to discharge all its obligations under that treaty.

Social Security Payments and Income Tax

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Prime Minister what is (a) the average cost of social security payments in the United Kingdom per head of the working population and (b) the average amount of income tax paid in the United Kingdom per head of the working population.

The Prime Minister: The cost of social security payments in the United Kingdom was nearly £1,350 per head of the working population in 1983-84. Income tax receipts were about £1,150 per head of the working population in 1983-84.

Conservation

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what action she has taken as a result of Mr. Max Nicholson's letter about the Scottish Office handling of conservation.

The Prime Minister: I wrote to Mr. Nicholson on 2 November 1984, when I told him that I am satisfied that the practice of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland in relation to conservation in general and licensing under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 in particular takes full account of the legislation concerned and of the merits of each licensing case considered. This practice will be reviewed as circumstances change and will be varied, if necessary, to reflect these changes.

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the response to the letter of 21 December 1984 from Sir Robert Armstrong to the secretary of the Council of Civil Service Unions regarding union membership at GCHQ, Cheltenham.

The Prime Minister: The reply to the letter referred to by the hon. Gentleman was dated 16 January 1985, was received on 17 January and brought to my attention the same day, as requested by the secretary of the Council of Civil Service Unions.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on progress concerning the proposed convention and recommendation on vocational rehabilitation and employment of disabled people and the proposd recommendation on the establishment of an international system for the maintenance of rights in social security, adopted at the international labour conference in June 1983.

The Prime Minister: Following consultations with the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress and other interested parties, including the National Advisory Council on the Employment of Disabled People, the Government considered their position in relation to the instruments adopted at the 1983 international labour conference and decided to accept recommendation No. 168 concerning vocational rehabilitation but not to ratify convention No. 159 concerning vocational rehabilitation, nor to accept recommendation No. 167 concerning social security. This decision was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment by way of a White Paper (Cmnd. 9417) which was laid before Parliament on Friday 21 December 1984.

Broadcasting

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Prime Minister how many individuals are employed by the interdepartmental co-ordinating committee structure responsible for broadcasting matters.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to my reply of 14 November 1984, at column 243, to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Prime Minister what is the estimated number in all Government Departments of employees concerned with the licensing and regulation of broadcasting.

The Prime Minister: The broadcasting department of the Home Office, which advises the Home Secretary on all matters relating to domestic broadcasting policy, currently consists of 22 full-time staff. The radio regulatory division of the Department of Trade and Industry is responsible for both the domestic and international planning and management of the radio frequency spectrum. Currently 12 staff are employed full time on technical and engineering work relating solely to broadcasting, and a number of other staff are concerned with broadcasting services as part of their wide responsibilities for the frequency spectrum. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office employs eight staff who work on matters connected with the BBC's external services. This figure does not include the substantial number of FCO administration and engineering staff in this country and abroad who are involved in the operation of FCO-controlled transmitting stations which carry BBC broadcasts.

Commander Wreford-Brown

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have any plans to instigate a prosecution of Commander Wreford-Brown in respect of information provided by him and published in "Our Falklands War" in March 1983.

The Prime Minister: Prosecution under the Official Secrets Acts is a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the European Parliament's committee of inquiry on alleged police violence during the current coal miners' dispute; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government regret that British Socialist Members have tried to drag purely domestic issues into the Parliament's affairs even though it has no responsibility for them. The Government also note that many other Members of the Parliament do not approve of this behaviour.

There is no question of our co-operating with this inquiry. There is no need for it. Police actions can be tested in the courts and complaints investigated under the Police Acts of 1964 and 1976. The general issues have been discussed several times in the House.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Assessment)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he has sought from qualified teachers with at least 10 years full-time experience teaching less able pupils concerning the feasibility of teachers' assessment.

Mr. Dunn: When my right hon. Friend seeks the view of school teachers, it is his practice to consult their national associations, and he wrote to the latter on 30 October last about the possibility of requiring local education authorities periodically to appraise the performance of their teachers.

Molecular Biology and Neurobiology

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what reply he has sent to Sir James Gowans, of the Medical Research Council, on the shortage of funds in molecular biology and neurobiology.

Mr. Brooke: In my right hon. Friend's reply of 10 January, at column 526, to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), he announced that, in the light of advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils, the Medical Research Council is to receive a grant-in-aid of £122·3 million from the science budget in 1985-86. This sum represents an increase of £2·1 million in the council's grant-in-aid over the previously published plans for that year. We believe that the Medical Research Council made its comments, about the difficulty of fully supporting the areas of science described, before it had been informed about the increased money. It will be for the council to decide how to apportion its grant-in-aid between the various areas of science it supports.

Teachers

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many secondary school teachers are currently employed by (a) the Inner London education authority and (b) the outer London boroughs combined.

Mr. Dunn: Estimated numbers of secondary school teachers employed in September 1984, the latest date for which figures are available, by (a) the Inner London education authority are 10,900, and (b) the outer London boroughs combined are 20,500, counting part-time teachers on the basis of their full-time equivalents.

School Leaving Dates

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he intends to introduce legislation to amend the Education (School Leaving Dates) Act 1976.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to do so.

School Leavers

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the literacy and numeracy standards of school leavers.

Mr. Dunn: The Government believe that there is room for improvement in the standards achieved by pupils of all abilities across the whole of the school curriculum. Our policies are designed to secure such an improvement.

British Antarctic Survey Ship (Penetrators)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the British Antarctic Survey ship Discovery has penetrators to test ways of burying nuclear waste in the seabed; and whether it is tasked to look for natural traps for hydrocarbons near the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Brooke: The royal research ship Discovery does not have such penetrators on board and is not tasked as the hon. Member describes. While RRS Discovery's present cruise is in support of the British Antarctic survey, the vessel is part of the Natural Environment Research Council's research fleet and is not a BAS vessel.

Teaching Services (Parents)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he intends to take on the report from the National Association of Schoolmasters/ Union of Women Teachers, a copy of which has been sent to him, about the level of use of parents to provide teaching services in schools.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend welcomes the growing participation of parents in their children's school education and has noted that this report acknowledges and illustrates the benefits to schools of parental involvement on a voluntary basis. As respects the concern expressed about some aspects of current arrangements, it is for head teachers, governing bodies and local education authorities to settle the forms that parental involvement might take and for authorities to settle the staffing complements for schools in the light of legal requirements, local priorities and available resources.

Student Grants

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has now received about student grants.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has received some 10,600 representations about the changes in student grants in 1985-86.

No Area Pooling System

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list the amounts paid to each local education authority in respect of the no area pooling system in each year since 1980 and the total cost of the system in each of these years.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 227]: Pooling is not a grant which is paid to local education authorities. It is a system of inter-authority payments which, as a matter of administrative convenience, is carried out by the Government through adjustments to authorities' block grant. It in no way affects the total of Government grant paid.

The provisional claims on the no area pool on which the adjustments for each year since 1980 have been made are given in the following table. The final adjustment in respect of each year will eventually be made on the basis of certified claims.

SCOTLAND

Investment

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those American companies that have announced investments in Scotland since the visit to the United States of America by the Scottish Industry Minister; and whether they are to receive automatic regional development grants.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Since I visited the United States, I am aware that the following American companies have announced their intention to invest in Scotland:

Gearhart Industries Inc.
Hughes Microelectronics Ltd.
W. L. Gore & Associates
Indy Electronics Inc.
Burroughs Machines Ltd.
Fibrmat Ltd.
Glassflake International Ltd.
Varian Associates Inc.
Intertrade Scientific
Eaton Semiconductor Equipment
Materials Research Inc.

The position as far as regional development grants are concerned is as follows:

1. Gearhart Industries' operation in Aberdeen was not eligible for regional development grant assistance under the old scheme and will not be eligible under the new scheme.
2. Hughes Microelectronics located in Glenrothes was eligible for regional development grants under the old scheme and will qualify for support at that location on assets provided by 28 November 1985. The company will not be eligible under the new scheme at Glenrothes, although regional selective assistance will continue to be available.
3. W. L. Gore Associates at Dundee, Indy Electronics Inc. at Irvine, Burroughs Machines Ltd. at Livingston, Fibrmat Ltd. at East Kilbride and Glassflake International Ltd. at Coatbridge qualified at their existing locations for regional development grants, and can do so again under the new scheme at those locations provided they have a suitable project.
4. Varian Associates Inc., Intertrade Scientific, Eaton Semiconductor Equipment and Materials Research Inc., which are sales and service companies located at Clydebank, did not qualify for regional development grants under the old scheme, but new investment may qualify at Clydebank under the new rules which now cover certain service activities.

Company Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate how many companies employing 10 or more workers have (a) started work and (b) announced closures in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is not available in the form requested. There are no comprehensive statistics on companies starting work. However, information available to the Manpower Services Commission indicates that in 1983 and 1984, respectively, there were 222 and 175 establishments in Scotland where closure gave rise to redundancies involving 10 or more workers in those years.

Emigration

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Scots people have emigrated in each year since 1979.

Mr. John MacKay: The available estimates of net migration, which relate to residents of Scotland and are subject to sampling error, are published in table 01.1 of the Registrar General for Scotland's Annual Report 1983, a copy of which is in the Library.

Electronics Industry

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will commission a study into present and future employment levels in the electronics industry in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I keep employment levels and prospects in electronics under continuing review, with particular attention to the demand for qualified manpower. I have no plans at present to commission any external study.

Police (Medical Treatment)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many policemen received financial assistance towards dental, optical or medical treatment in 1983 and 1984; what was the cost in each case; and why the officers were assisted.

Mr. Ancram: The detailed information requested is not readily available and could not be obtained from police authorities without disproportionate cost.

Before the introduction of the National Health Service, police officers were entitled to free medical and dental treatment as part of their conditions of service. When NHS charges were introduced, it was therefore agreed that officers should be reimbursed for medical or dental treatment on the basis of NHS charges. Reimbursement of the costs of approved types of spectacles or contact lenses suitable for use by serving officers while on outside duty stems from a recommendation by the Police Advisory Board for Scotland that candidates for the police service who are otherwise suitable but who need to wear spectacles or contact lenses should be regarded as acceptable if they are able to satisfy certain minimum standards of vision.

Fountain Forestry

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he was consulted about the purchase by Fountain Forestry of Creag Meagaidh at a cost of £7·50 per hectare; and how much public money has been given to Fountain Forestry for preserving site of special scientific interest status at Creag Meagaidh.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend was not consulted about the purchase, and there was no reason why he should have been as this was a private transaction.

I understand from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment that no public money by way of compensation has been paid to Fountain Forestry. The company has given notice under section 28 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 that it intends to carry out forestry operations on part of the Creag Meagaidh site, and discussions are continuing between it and the Nature Conservancy Council.

Alvey Directorate (Meeting)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the meeting arranged by the Scottish Development Department between industrialists and officials of the Alvey Directorate.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Alvey programme is the subject of a forum being held in Edinburgh on 29 January organised by the Scottish Electronics Technology Group (SETG), a grouping of industrialists and academics. The Scottish Development Agency made a grant to the SETG at its inception in July 1984 and is represented in the group. My Department has not had direct involvement in the organisation of the forum.

Nature Conservation

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish his reply to Mr. Ian Presst, Director of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, about support for nature conservation in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: The text of the letter is as follows:

Ian Presst Esq.,
Director,
Royal Society for the Protection of Birds,
The Lodge,
Sandy,
Bedfordshire
SG19 2DL

27 September 1984

Thank you for your letter of 7 September about nature conservation in Scotland.

While the Secretary of State welcomes the work of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and their support of conservation issues generally, he is unable to accept your charge that Scottish Ministers do not give it adequate support in Scotland. Mr. Younger and his colleagues give particular consideration to nature conservation issues. They have supported the provisions of the Wildlife and Countryside Act, which apply both north and south of the border, and they operate special arrangements, as described in the national planning guidelines —to which there is no English equivalent—which ensure that planning issues affecting the scientific interest of land may be brought to their attention.

The Secretary of State was happy to note you recognition that conservation is not the only issue which he has to take into account in arriving at decisions on land use. He appreciates that some specific decisions may not meet with the Society's approval, perhaps because with their specialised remit they may not generally be aware of all the ramifications of the other issues involved and, of course, because they have no statutory responsibility to ensure that an equitable decision is reached taking account of all the issues.

Comparisons between England and Scotland can sometimes overlook the widely differing circumstances, geographical, social and economic, and in particular the high proportion of Scotland which is remote countryside. In these areas, which often contain economically fragile communities, nature conservation is not always seen as being at the same risk as in the more intensely developed areas of the country; and in these circumstances any attitude which accords an overriding priority to the scientific interest of land without regard to the economic interests of the area is not necessarily in the best interests of nature conservation, nor of the local communities. The Secretary of State feels sure that you will appreciate the force of this argument. He considers that, while difficult decisions have to be made which cannot fully satisfy all the interests concerned, there is room in the remote areas of Scotland both for the maintenance of the local economy and for the protection of wildlife. He believes there is room for improvement in the presentation of the need for nature conservation particularly to land users and the inhabitants of the areas of special interest, whose goodwill at the end of the day is essential to any continuing successful programme of conservation. This is, of course, among the functions of the Nature Conservancy Council, but he believes that there is also an important role for the voluntary sector represented by such bodies as the RSPB.

As you may know, there has already been a meeting at Ministerial level last month, when the Minister of State met your Scottish chairman. If you feel that a further meeting would be helpful, I shall be happy to put you in touch with the appropriate Scottish Office official.

J. S. Graham,
Private Secretary

Abandoned Vehicle, Shrewsbury

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report from chief constables in Scotland as to which Scottish police forces were told on Wednesday 21 March 1984 by the West Mercia police or the vehicle licensing computer at Swansea about a white Renault car, licence number LNT 917W, or other cars abandoned in the Shrewsbury area.

Mr. Ancram: I understand that there has been no contact between West Mercia constabulary and Scottish forces about these matters.

Rate Fund Contribution Limits

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, following the latest increases in interest rates, he will revise the rate fund contribution limits fixed in the draft order for 1985-86.

Mr. Ancram: No. The aggregate rate fund contribution limit of £89·5 million contained in the order is the maximum amount which can be afforded for rate subsidies to housing current expenditure in Scotland in 1985-86 consistent with the total expenditure on housing in Scotland and the recently announced provisional allocations for the capital programmes.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Falkland Islands (Wildlife Report)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration he has given to the report of the wildlife consultant who visited the Falklands in December 1983.

Mr. Raison: The report is still under consideration by the Falkland Islands Government.

Ethiopia

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government have decided to continue the airlift to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: We are offering to extend the airlift to the end of March and to review the position again nearer that time.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people have left youth training schemes without a job; and what provision is made for them.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information on the precise number of young people who have left the youth training scheme without a job is not available. However, a sample survey of youngsters leaving the scheme between 1 April and 31 July 1984 showed that 34 per cent. were unemployed—and 58 per cent. were in jobs—at the time they completed the questionnaire, some three months after leaving the scheme. Seven per cent. of the unemployed youngsters were intending to go into full-time education or training.

The majority of youngsters leaving the youth training scheme are finding jobs. However, the Government continue to encourage employers, through the young workers scheme, to provide more jobs for 17-year-olds, including those leaving the youth training scheme. There are a number of other Government measures which, subject to eligibility conditions, are available to assist youngsters who leave the youth training scheme without a job, such as the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the estimated annual cost of the youth training scheme; and what proportion of this is fixed overhead cost unaffected by duration of training.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 36]: The estimate provision for expenditure on youth training in 1984-85 is about £802 million. It is not possible to identify precisely the proportion which relates to fixed overhead costs. However, it is estimated that about half of the expenditure incurred up to the end of December related to trainees' allowances and excess travel and lodging costs, and the remainder related to capital costs and other operating and training expenditure.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has received the projections of the numbers of persons who will reach retirement age and the numbers who will leave school or full-time education this year; and what will be the consequences of these projections for the unemployment total.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest projection of the number of persons reaching retirement age in Great Britain between mid-1984 and mid-1985 is 0·6 million. In the academic year 1984-85, it is estimated that about 0·9 million persons will leave school or full-time education. These factors are among many that may influence future levels of unemployment.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Soil Survey

Mrs. Roe asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has yet reached a decision on the future funding of the Soil Survey of England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have considered carefully the arrangements for the future funding of the Soil Survey of England and Wales and had the benefit of advice from the priorities board for research and development in agriculture and food on this issue.

My Department has funded the work of the Soil Survey for 12 years at a total cost of approximately £12 million. A great deal of useful material has been gathered and the survey has drawn up and published in 1984 a series of soil maps on the scale of 1:250,000 covering the whole of England and Wales. With the completion of that programme, it was appropriate to review my Department's requirements and the future level of funding.

In accordance with the recommendations of the priorities board, I have decided that while there will be no change in the funding of the survey in 1985-86, the Ministry's commission should be set at half the present level in 1986-87. This would result in a commission of around £850,000 in that year. The priorities board considered that this tapered adjustment would give the Soil Survey and the Agriculture and Food Research Council an opportunity to explore the possibility of alternative sources of income for future years.

Agriculture and Horticulture (Co-operatives)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes to make reductions in the grants payable to agricultural and horticultural co-operatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: We propose to make reductions in the grant rates payable to co-operatives broadly similar to those which have already been announced in relation to individual farm capital grants. Grant rates for horticultural co-operatives will, however, be kept at existing levels. For other co-operatives the grant rate for buildings will be reduced by five percentage points. Rates for plant and equipment are unchanged.

The changes are set out in the draft Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Scheme, copies of which were laid before the House on Monday.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Reform

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what organisations and individuals have so far been consulted about the possible formation of a trust to take over the management and ownership of Thamesmead after the abolition of the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: I visited Thamesmead recently and had an informal discussion with a number of representatives of community organisations, which I found very useful. I intend to hold further such discussions over the next few months. I have also had discussions with the London borough of Bexley. The London borough of Greenwich has not yet accepted my repeated invitations to a meeting. Subject to parliamentary approval of the Local Government Bill, we expect to begin formal consultation as soon as possible after it is enacted.

Sheltered Housing (Wardens)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to relax the duality of interests provisions in the Housing Act 1980 in so far as they affect wardens of sheltered housing schemes operated by housing associations; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: These provisions were included in the Housing Act 1980 to ensure absolute probity by housing association committee members, officers and employees involved in the handling of public funds. I have no plans to amend this legislation.

Housing Associations

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received relating to the operation of section 126 of and schedule 16 to the Housing Act 1980.

Sir George Young: The Department has received 30 representations about these provisions since they were enacted in 1980.

Property Services Agency (House Management)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by district council areas in Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Wiltshire and Dorset, how many empty homes there are owned or managed on behalf of other Government Departments by the Property Services Agency.

Sir George Young: Following is the information about empty homes currently held:

	Number
Cornwall
Carrick District Council	2
Caradon District Council	4
North Cornwall District Council	2
Penwith District Council	2
Total	10
Devon
Plymouth City Council	11
Torridge District Council	21
Total	32
Somerset
Sedgemoor District Council	2
Yeovil District Council	1
Total	3
Wiltshire
Kennet District Council	4
Salisbury District Council	122
Thamesdown District Council	2
North Wiltshire District Council	3
West Wiltshire District Council	1
Test Valley District Council	1
Total	133
Dorset
Christchurch Borough Council	6
Purbeck District Council	1
Total	7
Grand Total	185

Of this total, 95 are currently the subject of sale action and a further 20 are undergoing or will undergo works services in preparation for reuse.

Crown Agents Premises, Millbank

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the purchase by the Property Services Agency of the premises of the Crown Agents in Millbank for use by a Government Department.

Sir George Young: The sale of this building to an American hotel group was announced recently at a price considerably higher than could have been justified for its use as Government offices.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton can expect to receive a reply to the letter which he wrote to the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 20 November 1984, and which was transferred to his Department on or around 19 December 1984 under Ministery of Defence reference number DP/JL 754/84, relating to a constituent living in Melton Mowbray.

Mr. Gow: I replied to my hon. Friend on 16 January 1985.

Derelict land Clearance Area Status

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is considering granting derelict land clearance area status for any of the areas which lost assisted area status in the recent review.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is considering granting derelict land clearance area status for the Lancaster travel-to-work area, which lost its assisted area status in the recent review.

Mr. Macfarlane: The loss of assisted area status reduces the rate of grant available to local authorities for the reclamation of derelict land from 100 per cent. to 50 per cent. and for non-local authority applicants from 80 per cent. to 50 per cent. Certain areas which lost assisted area status in the review still contain significant concentrations of dereliction which need to be dealt with. If the higher rate of grant is no longer available, the recognised reclamation programme in these areas is likely to suffer.

I have decided, therefore, that the following districts should be granted derelict land clearance area status, which will restore their entitlement to 100 per cent. derelict land grant:

Boothferry (the Goole area)
Carrick (that part in the Truro TTWA)
Copeland (the coastal belt west of the Lake District national park)
Lancaster and Morecambe (west of the M6)
Restormel (that part in the St. Austell TTWA)
Vale Royal (that part in the Northwich TTWA)

The appropriate order will be laid before Parliament shortly.

TRANSPORT

Heavy Vehicles (Spray)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what research has been conducted or is in progress relating to the suppression of spray from heavy vehicles operating in wet conditions; and if he expects substantiye conclusions to be reached.

Mrs. Chalker: Research into spray has been carried out by Southampton university and the Transport and Road Research Laboratory. The results have been incorporated into British standard BS AU200 published last year.

Regulations have been made to make this standard mandatory on various classes of heavy lorry, starting with new trailers, this May.

Further research, mainly into the effects of aerodynamics on spray suppression, is continuing.

Dynamic Axle Weighbridges

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many vehicle axle weight, or half axle weight, weighing machines are in operation; and if they are used as preliminary checks in order to direct vehicles to officially recognised weighbridges.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department has installed some 50 dynamic axle weighbridges at the main roll-on/roll-off ports and at strategic points on or close to major routes. All these weighbridge sites are used regularly by the three enforcement agencies responsible for enforcement against overloading. None of these sites is used for preliminary weight checks.

Aerodromes (Highlands and Islands)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many formal offers to purchase were received for each of the Civil Aviation Authority's aerodromes in the Highlands and Islands by the 31 December 1984 deadline;

(2) whether he intends to extend the 31 December 1984 deadline for the receipt of formal offers to purchase the Civil Aviation Authority's aerodromes in the Highlands and Islands;

(3) what total sum is currently expected to be raised by the sale of such of the Civil Aviation Authority's Highlands and Islands airports in respect of which firm offers to purchase have been received;

(4) in respect of which Civil Aviation Authority aerodromes in the Highlands and Islands he has received offers for purchase.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Proposals in respect of all the aerodromes have been received, but, of those submitted by 31 December 1984, only one was in the form requested. It is being considered as well as other less formal proposals, and if the latter developed into formal offers they would not be rejected because the date has passed. Since all the aerodromes have been loss-making, it would be unrealistic to expect a large payment for these assets.

Road Safety Research

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the budgeted expenditure for 1984-85 on road safety research in the following categories: road safety, vehicle design, construction and safety and highway engineering; and if he will provide an estimate of the proportion of the total expenditure on road safety research relating to work on reducing accidents and casualties.

Mrs. Chalker: The budgeted expenditure on road safety research for 1984-85 is £4,410,000, of which £1,640,000 relates to road user safety, £1,420,000 to vehicle design, construction and safety and £1,350,000 to highway engineering safety improvements. All the expenditure is related to work on reducing accidents and casualties. In addition, £1,600,000 is budgeted in 1984-85 for research on general highway engineering projects in which road safety considerations are a factor. The proportion of this expenditure related to reducing accidents and casualties is estimated at 40 per cent.

Vehicle Test Certificates

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many convictions have been obtained in each of the last three years for the use of forged Ministry of Transport vehicle test certificates.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have been asked to reply.

The available information is for findings of guilt at magistrates' courts for all vehicle test certificate offences and is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1983); offences involving the use of forged Ministry of Transport vehicle test certificates cannot be separately identified.

DEFENCE

Recruits (Ireland)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of recruits are from the island of Ireland in each of the following regiments: (a) the Royal Irish Rangers, (b) 5th Royal Inniskilling Dragoon Guards, (c) the Queen's Royal Irish Hussars and (d) the Irish Guards.

Mr. Lee: In 1984 the following proportions of recruits to the regiments named were from Ireland:

	Officers per cent.	Other ranks per cent.
(a) Royal Irish Rangers	63	64
(b) 5th Royal Inniskilling Dragoon Guards	23	12
(c) Queen's Royal Irish Hussars	17	20
(d) Irish Guards	24	50

Foreign Armed Forces

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the countries whose armed forces were provided with training by Her Majesty's armed forces in 1983 and 1984, respectively;

(2) if he will list the countries whose police or paramilitary forces were provided with training by Her Majesty's armed forces in 1983 and 1984, respectively.

Mr. Lee: The list of countries and territories whose forces were provided with training by Her Majesty's armed forces in 1983 and 1984, respectively, is as follows:

1983

The specific details are confidential between the countries concerned and Her Majesty's Government, but in each case military rather than police training was given.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list all the foreign armed forces to which members of Her Majesty's armed forces were seconded, or in which they served by arrangement with his Department, during 1984;

(2) if he will list all the foreign police or paramilitary forces to which members of Her Majesty's armed forces were seconded, or in which they served by arrangement with his Department during 1984.

Mr. Lee: In 1984 members of Her Majesty's armed forces served on loan, secondment or exchange with the armed forces of the following countries and territories:

Australia
Bahamas
Bahrain
Bangladesh
Barbados
Belgium
Belize
Bermuda
Brazil
Brunei

The specific details are confidential between the Governments concerned, but in each case military rather than police assistance was given.

Procurement Executive

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out in tabular form in the Official Report the structure and composition of the Procurement Executive, including the numbers employed and their rank in each case, and the reporting lines.

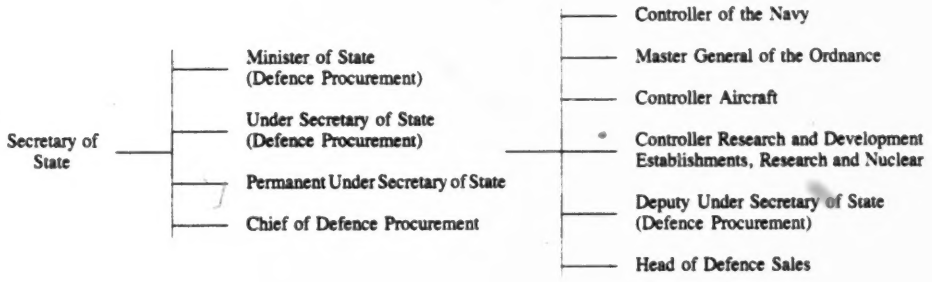
Mr. Butler: The information requested is too detailed and lengthy to set out in tabular form in the Official Report. The main reporting lines in the Procurement Executive are as follows:



Secretary of State
Minister of State (Defence Procurement)
Under Secretary of State (Defence Procurement)
Permanent Under Secretary of State
Chief of Defence Procurement
Controller of the Navy
Master General of the Ordnance
Controller Aircraft
Controller Research and Development Establishments, Research and Nuclear Deputy Under Secretary of State (Defence Procurement)
Head of Defence Sales

The essential details of staff numbers are as follows:

	Numbers employed
	Civilian	Service
Sea systems projects	5,328	632
Land systems projects	2,336	281
Air systems projects	1,802	120
Research and development	23,645	623
Central services including contracts and quality assurance	5,137	34
Defence sales	283	21
Total	38,531	1,711

Further details are set out in the annual publication "The Civil Service Year Book", published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Trident

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence over how many years his Department's budget will bear the costs of Trident; and what percentage the project will represent of the total defence estimates in each of those years.

Mr. Butler: The procurement period for the Trident system is currently assessed at about 20 years, during which it will account on average for some 3 per cent. of the defence budget and about 6 per cent. at its peak.

TriStars

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest cost figures for the purchase of TriStars for the Royal Air Force to augment the existing tanker fleet.

Mr. Butler: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, I am unable to give this information.

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement took until 19 December 1984 to advise the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton that the hon. Member's letter of 20 November 1984, covered by departmental reference DP/JL 754/84 and relating to an individual constituent in Melton Mowbray had been transferred to the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Lee: My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton wrote to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 20 November. As the case apparently concerned the relationship of a civilian contractor's employee to the Ministry of Defence, it was judged to fall within my area of responsibility and was therefore passed to my office, where it was received on 4 December. My right hon. Friend advised my hon. Friend of this transfer in a letter dated 30 November. Subsequent investigation established, however, that the constituent's company was contracted to work for the Property Services Agency. The correspondence was therefore passed to the Department of Environment, and my hon. Friend was informed of this by letter on 19 December.

I am sorry if there has been any inconvenience caused.

Territorial Army Headquarters (Sutton in Ashfield)

Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Defence why the Territorial Army headquarters at Sutton in Ashfield, Nottinghamshire, is being fully manned with regular soldiers and a barrier placed on the entrance to the property.

Mr. Lee: The Territorial Army centre at Sutton in Ashfield, Nottinghamshire, is manned and guarded by TA personnel and not by regular soldiers. The barrier on the entrance to the premises has been in operation to control vehicle access as part of standard security measures.

Chemical Warfare (Research)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence what research is being undertaken into chemical warfare; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Research in the field of chemical warfare is concerned solely with defence against attack by such means. Research falls into three main areas: the detection of chemical agents; the protection of personnel and equipment; and therapy, including prophylactic treatment.

Type 22 Warship

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is now his intention to award the pending naval order for the two type 22 warships to one or more of the three short-listed yards solely on the basis of the most commercially competitive tenders received.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 94]: The primary considerations in deciding where to place an order are costs and delivery time scales. However, account is also being taken of other relevant factors, but no decision has yet been taken. An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

South Africa

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the number of major United Kingdom investments which have taken place in, and of major contracts which have been concluded with, South Africa in the past 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: We are, of course, aware of information which is in the public domain, but there is no universal requirement for United Kingdom companies to report annually to my Department on these matters, and therefore the picture we have may not be complete. The latest information on levels of United Kingdom investment in South Africa was contained in the reply given to my hon. Friend by the Prime Minister on 11 May 1984 at column 471. British exporters currently have slightly less than 11 per cent. of the South African market.

EC Research Council

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress was made at the meeting of the Research Council of European Community Ministers on 19 December; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: The Community's Council of Ministers (Research) met on 19 December 1984 in Brussels. I represented Her Majesty's Government.

The Council agreed the 1985 work plan for the European strategic programme of research on information technology (ESPRIT).

The Council also reached agreement on the financial resources to be devoted to a number of research programmes proposed by the Commission, against a background of budgetary constraints in the Community. The financial commitments foreseen for these programmes amount to 1,225 million ecu. The programmes, summarised as follows, will be formally adopted once a number of details have been finalised and the appropriate procedures completed.

The Community's thermonuclear fusion programme has provisionally been allocated 690 million ecu for the period 1985-89. The aim of the programme is to look at thermonuclear fusion in relation to future energy strategies. There are two elements to the programme: first, the Joint European Torus (JET) at UKAEA, Culham, forms the basis of research into controlled thermonuclear fusion; and, secondly, work on the fusion physics Next European Torus (NET), and so on.

The third non-nuclear energy programme—allocated 175 million ecu for 1985-88—is concerned with the efficient management and rational use of energy and its supply for renewable sources. To this end there are nine sub-programmes covering research into solar energy, biomass, wind energy, geothermal energy, energy conservation, solid fuels, new energy carriers, energy systems analysis and hydrocarbon.

Basic research in industrial technologies for Europe, known as BRITE, has been allocated 125 million ecu and will run from 1985 to 1988. The programme is designed to improve the technological base of the more traditional industries in the Community and to encourage the introduction of advanced technology to these industries.

A biotechnology programme, with funds of 55 million ecu running from 1985 to 1989, will include research and development on basic technology and training, development of culture collections, data banks, action on patents; with specific actions aimed at the agrofood, chemical and health care industries.

Programmes in radiation protection and the management of radioactive waste have been jointly allocated 120 million ecu and will be starting in 1985 to finish in 1989. The aim of the research into radiation protection is to evaluate the effects and hazards arising from exposure to natural or man-made ionising radiation. This will particularly involve research into radiation dosimetry, radioactivity in the environment, radiation as a cause of cancer or genetic change. The radioactive waste programme will be looking at ways to treat and safely dispose of waste and the establishment of underground laboratories for that purpose in some other member states.

A programme to stimulate European co-operation and scientific and technical interchange is to run from 1985 to 1988 at a cost of 60 million ecu. The aim of the programme is to aid the mobility of scientists, improve communication and exchange of information between scientists, and generally to develop co-operation in the field of European science and technology.

The Council agreed that the work proposal by the Commission in the field of reactor safety should be integrated with that of the joint research centre at no additional cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the future of the two United Kingdom sovereign bases in the island of Cyprus is on the agenda of the present talks on the future constitution of the Republic of Cyprus between the leaders of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities and the United Nations Secretary-General in New York.

Mr. Renton: No.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Newspapers, Books and Periodicals (VAT)

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what European Economic Community countries value added tax is charged on newspapers, books and periodicals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply on 30 November, at column 605, to my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory).

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Spearing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the deficit in trade in manufactured goods between the United Kingdom and other members of the European Economic Community for 1984, estimated if necessary, based on quarterly figures.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Low Pay

Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the recommendation in the recent report from the west midlands low pay unit, a copy of which has been sent to him, about the effect of the eligibility conditions for national insurance contributions on some groups of claimants; and if he will consider seeking to enable workers in this situation to have at least some of their contributions refunded.

Mr. Newton: Refunds of contributions can be made only if the contributions were paid in error. Under the present arrangements, liability for national insurance contributions is assessed at the time earnings are paid. The contributions paid in any particlar week or month are not affected by any subsequent earnings, or lack of earnings. As my right hon. Friend told the House on 27 November, we are looking at the structure of national insurance, including the lower and upper earnings limits.

Adoptions

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimate he has made of the number of babies available for adoption annually.

Mr. John Patten: The information is not available in the form requested. The table gives the number of adoptions of children aged under two years where neither of the adopters was a parent.

Adoptions by joint adopters (neither a parent) England and Wales 1979-1983

Year	Children under 2 years when adopted
1979	2,918
1980	2,903
1981	2,701
1982	2,507
1983	2,276

Death Grant

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report the provisions that exist in other European Economic Community member countries for assistance towards the costs of funerals and burials.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to section V of the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the Member States of the European Communities, Portugal and Spain (Position at 1 January 1984)", a copy of which is in the Library.

Employment of Children Act 1973

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of implementing the Employment of Children Act 1973; and what would be the main elements making up these costs.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the costs of implementing the Employment of Children Act 1973 is not available. Following consultation with local authority associations in 1975 and 1977 on the introduction of new regulations under the Act, it was agreed the implementation would have considerable resource implications for local authorities. One of the main costs envisaged was in respect of additional staff for their effective administration.

Drug Advisory Committees

Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) which local health authorities have set up drug advisory committees; and for how long each has been operating;

(2) what reports he has had of regional health authority multidisciplinary drug problem teams' operations; and what plans he has for their further development;

(3) which regional health authorities have established a multi-disciplinary regional drug problem team;

(4) what reports he has had of the work of local health authority drug advisory committees; and what plans he has for their further development.

Mr. John Patten: Our officials are currently analysing the responses we have received from regional health authorities about these and other aspects of service provision for drug misusers. I shall write to my hon. Friend when the analysis is complete.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what steps he is taking to alleviate the problems of the totally homeless during extremely cold weather; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take steps to secure the provision of shelter for the totally homeless during extremely cold weather; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Accommodation for the homeless is mainly a matter for local authorities which have specific duties under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977.

The Secretary of State has a statutory duty under the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976, as amended, to provide and maintain resettlement units where homeless single people without a settled way of life are provided with temporary board and lodging with a view to influencing them to lead a more settled life.

There are vacant beds in virtually all of the 23 resettlement units at present.

Correspondence

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Minister of State proposes to reply to the letter written to him on 18 September 1984, reference PO (5) 4374/27, regarding Mr. Alan Coleman of 2 Shenton Close, Thurmaston, Leicestershire, about which the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton also spoke to the Minister's Private Office shortly before the Christmas recess and requested an immediate reply.

Mr. Newton: I have written to my hon. Friend today, and regret the delay which has occurred.

Specialist Claims Control

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will publish the report on savings attributable to specialist claims control; and whether he will list the basis on which the new calculations are being made.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my hon. Friend's reply to him on 23 November 1984 at column 327. The final report of the extended study is still awaited.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply, Official Report, 14 January, column 64, what sum he estimates will be incurred in meeting claims for exceptionally severe weather payments in respect of the week ended 12 January.

Mr. Newton: Information is not available to estimate the cost of meeting claims for payments of supplementary benefit towards fuel bills in respect of the week ended 12 January.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of the exceptionally severe weather payments.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans at present to change the existing provisions relating to single payments for helping supplementary benefit claimants to pay for extra fuel used in periods of exceptionally severe weather. However, the chief adjudication officer will no doubt be looking at the guidance he has issued on the interpretation of the regulations in the light of experience. More generally, we are looking at the provision for meeting special expenses of this sort in the context of the supplementary benefit review.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was paid out in exceptionally severe weather payments in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Newton: There were no payments made in 1981, 1983 or 1984 under Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulation 26(1)(a)—help with fuel bills in periods of exceptionally severe weather. In 1982, about 280,000 payments were made at a cost of some £3·6 million.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services who will appoint the management consultants to review the functions and working of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The management consultants will be appointed under arrangements to be agreed between the regional health authority and our Department.

Home Dialysis Machines

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of patients receiving renal dialysis treatment have been allocated a home dialysis machine.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Data provided by the European Dialysis and Transplant Association show that on 31 December 1982, the most recent date for which information is available, 3,708 patients were being treated by haemodialysis in the United Kingdom, of whom 2,218 —60 per cent.—were receiving haemodialysis at home.

National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what level of support he plans to allocate to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children during the next two years.

Mr. John Patten: The Department will provide £167,000 in the financial years 1985-86 and 1986-87 towards the headquarters administration expenses of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. In addition, the Department will provide £35,000 during 1985-86 towards the society's programme to second its staff for social work qualifying courses.

Drugs (Wastage)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his reaction to the proposals put forward by the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee about prevention of wastage of drugs under the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are always prepared to consider suggestions for reducing the National Health Service drugs bill. The pharmaceutical services negotiating committee — PSNC — supports the Government's limited list proposals in principle and has put its detailed points to us as part of the consultations. Further representations on possible savings from the PSNC are being taken into account in the negotiations on a new contract for pharmacists.

Overseas Pensions Branch

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what levels of overtime pay have been allocated to staff in the overseas pensions branch of the Department of Health and Social Security to deal with the claims from pensioners living abroad during the dispute involving computer operators.

Mr. Newton: Since the start of the dispute a total of almost £900,000 has been paid in overtime to staff in the Department's overseas branch.

Gillick Case (Judgment)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects formally to lodge an appeal against the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Gillick case.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The necessary documents are being prepared and will be lodged as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Violence in Sport

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on progress on measures to combat violence in sport.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Government hav concentrated their efforts on the need to reduce spectator violence associated with soccer, since this properly attracts particular public concern.

Since 1979 the Government have introduced a number of measures aimed at containing and controlling "football hooliganism" at home and abroad. These include strengthening the powers and penalties available to the courts; introducing a "liaison group" to oversee and coordinate the precautions taken by the authorites concerned; drawing the attention of League clubs to the precautions which they should take; and promoting within the Council of Europe a recommendation on the reduction of spectator violence at sporting events, which sets out the precautions which the various counties and authorities should take.

We are now reviewing the current policies and measures with the football authorities. We published for consultation last August the report of an interdepartmental working group; with Ministerial colleagues from the other Departments concerned, I have beem holding a series of meetings with interested representative organisations to discuss the report's conclusions and recommendations. The organisations concerned and the dates of meetings, are:

The Football League—25 September 1984
The Football Trust—5 November 1984
The Football Grounds Improvement Trust—5 November 1984
The Magistrates Association—6 November 1984
The Association of Chief Police Officers—8 November 1984
The Superintendents' Association—8 November 1984
The Police Federation—8 November 1984
The All Party Back Bench Committee on Football—13 November 1984
The Association of County Councils—14 November 1984
The Association of Metropolitan Authorities—14 November 1984
The London Boroughs Association—14 November 1984
The Association of District Councils—14 November 1984
The Scottish Football Association—19 November 1984
The Scottish Football League—19 November 1984
The Welsh Football Association—19 November 1984
The Professional Footballers' Association—26 November 1984
The Football League Executive Staffs' Association—17 December 1984

At my request the Football Association has attended these meetings.

The organisations consulted are now submitting detailed written comments. Once these representations have been properly considered, the Government will make a further statement.

Shire Counties (Expenditure)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will show for each of the shire counties in England, the amount spent under the following budget heads, expressed as a percentage of the total budget for the last year for which figures are available: (a) planning and transportation, (b) social services, (c) public protection, (d) Home Office services, (e) recreational and environmental services, and (f) central services.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Following is the information relating to net current expenditure of shire counties in England, based on their 1984-85 budgets. The remaining percentage of expenditure not identified by the categories below relates to other services provided by shire counties, mainly education.

Government Buildings (Emergency Power)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has taken any recent steps to install emergency electricity generators in any Government administrative buildings.

Sir George Young: No such steps have been taken recently. Standby generators are already installed in all those Government establishments on the Civil estate that are unable to withstand even minimal interruption of the electricity supply.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the representations received from Welwyn Hatfield district council regarding rate support grant 1985-86 and of the Government's response to the points raised.

Mr. Waldegrave: When I met members of the council in July they sought three changes to the block grant system: a discount for areas with high rateable values per head, an allowance in GRE for the special needs of new towns, and a different treatment of the Metropolitan police precept outside Greater London. They opposed any change in the arrangement whereby potential surpluses on housing revenue account are disregarded. The rate support grant report which the House approved on 16 January meets their concern on the third and fourth points.

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of the representations received from Hertfordshire county council regarding rate support grant settlement 1985-86 and of the Government's response to the points made.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Textiles (EC Allocations)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ensure that allocations made under the European regional development fund non-quota textile measures are additional resources to the recipient authorities.

Sir George Young: In setting public expenditure programmes, the Government take account of anticipated receipts from the European Community and the programmes are consequently higher than they would be otherwise.

Home Insulation Grants

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what increase has been made in the provision for home insulation grants in England contained in the total local authority housing capital allocations for 1985-86, to take account of the first full year of the operation of the topping-up grants for loft insulation under the homes insulation grant scheme.

Sir George Young: Local authorities housing investment programme allocations in England for 1985-86 includes £31 million for the homes insulation scheme.

For 1984-85 the allocation is £35 million. Latest estimates suggest an expenditure of some £31 million for 1984-85, which includes the first 9 months of operation of the scheme since it was extended to the topping-up of existing insulation.

Housing Defects Act 1984

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department has now concluded its discussions with the National House Building Council to establish agreed standards of repairs to the various types of pre-fabricated reinforced concrete dwellings designated under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Gow: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) on 9 January 1985 at column 474.

Local Authorities (Land Disposal)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the orders he has made requiring local authorities to dispose of vacant, derelict or under-used land, including the authorities and the acreage involved in each order; when each order takes effect; what the consequences will be; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: Four directions were made on 19 November 1984, under section 98 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980, in respect of the following:

Location	Approx. acreage	Landowner
Barmpton Land West, Darlington	3	Darlington borough council
Barton Lane, Clifton Nottingham	17	Nottingham city council
Oozewood Road, Royton	6	Oldham borough council
Doxford Park Way, Silksworth Sunderland	6	Sunderland borough council

The directions, which took effect when they were issued, instructed the landowners to take steps to dispose of the land by tender within a specified period. I am monitoring progress in each case.

Sports Facilities

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of urban aid is designated for new sporting projects; and what offers he has made to local authorities of the pound for pound scheme in the inner cities.

Mr. Macfarlane: Urban programme funds are not allocated for specific purposes: Sports projects have to compete with others for the funds available. In 1983-84, applications valued at £20 million were supported, out of an Urban Programme allocation of £257 million.

The aim of the £-for-£ scheme is to encourage private sector — not local authority — investment in sporting projects and facilities. Following the success of £-for-£ schemes in Merseyside and Bristol, we have made money available to the Sports Council for further schemes in London and the west midlands this year.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends further to encourage companies to offer the community shared use of sports facilities.

Mr. Macfarlane: Yes, with the Sports Council and other interested organisations.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sports fields and other former recreational lands are currently classified as derelict land on the Land Register.

Mr. Macfarlane: Land registers record details of unused or underused land owned by public bodies; not all such land is derelict. The current or previous use of 215 sites comprising 5,500 acres of registered land is shown as "leisure or recreations". The computerised information we maintain on all registers does not classify sports fields separately.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has received from the 100 businesses he contacted in 1983 asking them to review the use of their sporting facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The increasing demand for sport and recreation opportunities needs to be met if possible through expanding the use of existing facilities, as well as through new provision. My initiative in writing to the chairmen of the 100 top companies was designed to assess the potential for greater community use of company sports facilities. The response from chairmen was generally positive. We ascertained that most company sports grounds and clubs are already open to the local community, and I am very grateful to the companies concerned for their important contribution to meeting local needs. I asked the sports council to follow up many responses at the local level. They established that in about 20 cases there could be some scope for development. The council continues to pursue these possibilities.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether, in the new system for monitoring land use changes that commenced in January, he will include sports fields owned by local authorities and others.

Mr. Macfarlane: Sports fields are included under outdoor recreation in the new system for monitoring land use changes and cannot therefore be separately identified. As that system was only introduced on 1 January, it would be premature to consider further subdividing the present 24 categories of land uses.

Private Sector Housing Development

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward legislation to empower a local authority to secure the satisfactory internal layout of a proposed private sector housing development.

Mr. Gow: No.

Non-quota Textile Measures

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the first allocations under the European regional development fund non-quota textile measures to be given to the recipient authorities.

Sir George Young: We shall be inviting applications from local authorities soon and expect to take decisions on the allocation of non-quota aid for infrastructure works once their proposals are received, probably in March or April. Authorities were given guidance some months ago about the schemes which would be eligible for assistance and this should enable them to respond quickly and effectively.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has decided the breakdown of the Housing Corporation's approved development programme for 1985-86.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend announced on 18 December that the gross provision for the Housing Corporation in 1985-86 was £685 million, comprising an allocation of £605 million plus an estimated £80 million of capital receipts. Of the gross provision of £685 million, £500 million will be needed to meet existing commitments on fair rent and hostel projects, and £85 million to meet commitments on low cost home ownership projects.

The balance of the provision will be used largely to finance new projects for rent, and low cost home ownership including provision for the new scheme for tenants of charitable housing associations, for which the latest estimate made of the likely cost in 1985-86 is £17 million.

The detailed breakdown of the corporation's approved development programme is as follows:

Housing Corporation—approved development programme 1985-86
(All figures expressed in estimated 1985-86 out-turn prices)

		£ million
Net allocation (cash limit)		605
Receipts		80
Gross allocation		685
Memorandum of authorisation:
Programme heads
Existing fair rent and hostel projects
1. Contracted expenditure (block 1)		380
2. New tenders approved (block 2)		120
3. New fair rent and shared housing projects (block 3)		50
Other tenures
4.—(a) Improvement for sale (b) Leasehold schemes for the elderly (c) Shared ownership (d) Home-ownership for tenants of charitable housing associations	Committed expenditure: 85 New projects: 31	116
5. Major repairs		14
6. Mini Hag		2
		682
7. Right-to-buy mortgages		3
		685

Notes:

1. Included in blocks 2 and 3 (fair rent) and other tenures is an additional amount of £9 million provided by the Secretary of State to cover the cost of certain projects to be undertaken on Merseyside.
2. In addition to provision for low cost home ownership within the ADP a proportion of expenditure on committed and new projects is to be met by the use of index-linked private finance.
3. New fair rent and shared housing projects. The allocation of funds under this head will initiate projects to a total cost of some £460 million to be completed over the next three to four years. About 45 per cent. of these resources will go to provide housing for elderly people. The remainder will be used to help people with a range of disadvantages, financial, physical and social. £7 million will be available for expenditure within the year on new hostel and shared housing projects with a total cost in excess of £40 million.

Survey of London

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements are to be made for the future of Survey of London once the Greater London council has been abolished.

Mr. Macfarlane: Responsibility for the Survey of London will pass to the Royal Commission on Historical Monuments. This decision, originally announced in the White paper "Streamlining the Cities" (Cmnd 9063), reflects the long and close relationship between the Royal Commission and the Survey of London which will now continue without disruption.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Costs

Mr. Thurnham asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will give the current total estimated cost for the House during 1984-85, including salaries, allowances, printing and production of Parliamentary Debates, buildings and security.

Mr. Beith: Total expenditure, including the salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament but excluding building costs, is currently estimated at £62,576,000, of which £17,533,000 is on the House of Commons Administration Vote for which the House of Commons Commission is directly responsible. The Property Services Agency's parliamentary works programme for 1984-85, which covers both Houses of Parliament, is estimated at £11·333 million.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Johnson Matthey Bankers

Mr. Gould asked the Attorney-General what action is being taken to investigate reports that Johnson Matthey Bankers was, amongst other City institutions, the victim of a major currency fraud and to prosecute those responsible; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No complaint of this nature has been received by the Director of Public Prosecutions from Johnson Matthey Bankers or any other City institution.

PRIME MINISTER

VJ Day

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Prime Minister if, having regard to Her Majesty's Government's final decision on the commemoration of Victory in Europe Day, they will give careful consideration, in good time, to the commemoration of Victory over Japan Day; and if she will take steps to ascertain the intentions in this matter of the other Commonwealth and allied Governments concerned.

The Prime Minister: As I said in the House on 17 January at column 504, we shall remember both occasions in the commemorations. We shall be in touch with other interested Governments about their intentions.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Complaints)

Mr. Cabom asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints have been made against police officers in the United Kingdom in the past 11 months; how many have been upheld; how many such complaints have been associated with the miners' strike; and what number of these have been upheld.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend's responsibility covers police forces in England and Wales. The latest general information available relates to 1983. In that year 19,012 complaints cases (which might relate to a number of separate matters of complaint from one or more complainants) from members of the public were recorded against police officers. Of individual complaints disposed of in the same period, 1,448 were sub stantiated, 14,353 were unsubstantiated (including those in respect of which the Police Complaints Board granted a dispensation under the Police (Withdrawn, Anonymous Etc. Complaints) Regulations), and 14,880 were withdrawn or otherwise not proceeded with.

I understand that in the period from 13 March 1984 to 8 January 1985, 530 complaints were made against police officers relating to actions arising during the course of the miners' dispute and 100 of these have been withdrawn. Most of the complaints are still under investigation and the number so far substantiated could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prisoners (Ethnic Origins)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the ethnic origin of those (a) men, (b) women and (c) juveniles received into prison department establishments in 1983 and 1984;

(2) if he now has an ethnic breakdown of prisoners serving custodial sentences.

Mr. Mellor: Following the introduction on 1 June 1984 of revised procedures for collecting information on the ethnic origin of persons received into prison department establishments, the quality of the data has improved and it is expected that information about receptions will become available later this year. My right hon. and learned Friend will then arrange for its publication. Information about the whole of the sentenced population including those received before 1 June 1984 will not become available until some time later.

Civil Defence

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department is carrying out into nuclear, biological and chemical protection of the civilian population; and what priority such research has.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are continually engaged in a programme of research into protective measures against the effect of modern weapons as determined by the Government's assumptions about the nature of the threat. These are contained in Home Office circular No. ES 1/1984 (a copy of which is in the Library of the House). The work is given a high priority.

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he gives advice to local authorities on how to protect their civil defence radio networks against the effects of nuclear electro-magnetic pulse.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes, and consideration is being given to how this guidance might be extended. I will keep the House informed of progress.

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress the working party on local authority communications is making; and when he hopes to have the final report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The working party on civil defence communications is considering its final report which it hopes to make later this year.

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assumption was made for the report on standardisation of training of civil defence volunteers on the numbers that would need to be trained.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The working party made no assumption on numbers.

Prison Department (Dental Charges)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of court actions (a) started in the last year and (b) current against the prison department for the non-payment of dental charges.

Mr. Mellor: Seven sets of proceedings have been issued in 1984 against the Home Office or its officers relating to the non-payment of dental charges. One of these actions was struck out, the rest are being defended. Three additional High Court actions which relate to proceedings commenced in 1983 are also current: one of these is a consolidated action relating to non-payment of dental charges: the other two, one of which is at present dormant, relate to compensation for cancelled dental clinics. All these proceedings have been issued by the same person.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners committed suicide in penal establishments in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Twenty verdicts of suicide have been recorded at inquests on prisoners who died in prison department custody during 1984. Inquests on three further prisoners have yet to be held.

Animals (Experiments)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the criteria he uses in deciding whether or not to make publicly available information about experiments on living animals.

Mr. Mellor: Apart from the information published in the statistical returns which are presented to Parliament each year, we consider each request for information on its merits, bearing in mind the need to protect confidentiality and physical security.

Police (Computers)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the review conducted by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis into the use within the force of privately-owned computers has been completed; and what decision has been reached.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that he has prohibited the use of privately-owned computers for police purposes.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to ensure that the disclosure requirements relating to computers used by the police are the same, regardless of who owns the computers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There is no need for such legislation as the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 apply regardless of who owns the computer.

Deportation Statistics

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons under the age of 20 years have been deported from addresses in the city of London and the boroughs of Westminster, Kensington and Chelsea, Wandsworth, Lambeth, Southwark, Lewisham, Tower Hamlets, Hackney, Islington, and Camden, respectively, in each of the years from 1979 to date.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not available, but the figures for the United Kingdom as a whole do not suggest that there has been any substantial increase in such deportations since 1979.

Sentencing Policy

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue to all magistrates a circular drawing attention to the cost saving between custodial and community service sentences for non-serious offenders as set out in the answer to the hon. Member for Billericay of 16 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to issue a circular specifically drawing attention to these figures. Magistrates will, however, be aware of the importance we attach to the use of non-custodial penalties where appropriate; and their substantial and increasing use of the community service order in recent years indicates their confidence in it as an alternative disposal.

Imitation Firearms

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of imitation firearms being used in the course of crime have been reported during each of the past five years for which figures are available, in (a) England and Wales and (b) the Metropolitan police district.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information requested is given in the following table. Figures for England and Wales are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 3.3 of the issue for 1983, Cmnd. 9349) copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in which imitation firearms were reported to have been used

Number of offences

	England and Wales	Metropolitan police district
1979	144	65
1980	161	64
1981	206	88
1982	183	71
1983	167	57

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received advocating the strengthening of legislation governing the use of replica firearms; and what reply he has given.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have received a few such representations, generally as part of representations about a range of firearms issues, often in terms suggesting that the writer does not know of the existing controls on replicas.

In reply, we have referred to the present controls and how they apply to the different categories of imitation firearms. It is already an offence to use any imitation firearms to resist arrest or to commit a crime. Heavy penalties apply in such cases. Those which can be readily converted to fire live ammunition are subject to the firearm certificate procedures. We have pointed out, however, that it is not practicable to restrict the sale or use of toy guns since there are already millions in circulation, and such a control would be ineffective because life-like imitations can easily be constructed by those set on a criminal act.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions under the Firearms Act 1982 relating to imitation firearms have been brought since it came into force; and how many such prosecutions have led to convictions.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Prosecutions relating to imitation firearms would be brought under the Firearms Acts 1968 and 1982. The information collected centrally on court proceedings (unlike that on notifiable offences recorded by the police) does not distinguish offences involving imitation firearms and such information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any examples have been drawn to his attention of imitation weapons which fall outside the scope of the Firearms Act 1982 being used for criminal purposes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There have been cases where toy guns, and imitation firearms which were not readily convertible to fire live ammunition, have been used in crime. Such articles are outside the scope of the Firearms Act 1982, but the possession of any imitation firearm while committing an offence is punishable with heavy penalties.

Firearms Act 1982

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to review the scope and effectiveness of the Firearms Act 1982.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no plans to do so at present.

Mr. Yasser Arafat

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any inquiries since 19 December 1984, whether oral or written, that Yasser Arafat should be granted a visa to enter the United Kingdom in the near future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We have received no such inquiries.

Hotel Television Licences

Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total revenue derived from hotel television licences in 1984; and what is the estimated amount for 1985 under the new arrangements for hotel television licensing.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Television licence fee revenue paid by hotels in 1984 is not separately recorded, but we estimate that it was about £1 million. We estimate that under the new licensing requirements for hotels revenue from this source in 1985 will be some £3 million.

Prevention of Terrorism

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will indicate the number of people held under the Prevention of Terrorism Act between 1 January 1983 and the present; and, of these, how many were detained (a) whilst Parliament was in recess and (b) while Parliament was sitting;

(2) if he will indicate the number of people held under the Prevention of Terrorism Act from 1983 onwards together with (a) a breakdown of this total by country of origin, (b) the number of these whose period of detention was extended by his Department who were subsequently charged, (c) the number of these whose period of detention was extended by his Department who were subsequently released without charge and (d) a breakdown of the reasons for his Department's decision to extend the period of detention.

Mr. Brittan: I will reply as soon as possible.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information is available to him from the daily reports provided to him through the National Reporting Centre about the average number of pickets employed by the National Union of Mineworkers for each week of the strike.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The reports do not contain this information.

Winson Green Prison

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison ministers have been appointed at Winson Green prison in Birmingham.

Mr. Mellor: There are two full-time chaplains—one Church of England, one Roman Catholic—and one part-time Methodist chaplain. There is also a full-time Church Army captain. In addition, there are 8 other Ministers accredited to visit inmates of particular religious faiths.

Assisted Prison Visits Scheme

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people received assistance with the cost of visits to prisoners under the assisted prison scheme during the financial year 1983-84.

Mr. Mellor: The Department of Health and Social Security administer the scheme on behalf of the Home Office. I am advised that the number of giro transactions and travel warrants issued is recorded, but not the number of persons involved.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many civil servants were employed in P5 division in December 1984.

Mr. Brittan: On 31 December 1984 there were 33 civil servants in post in P5 division out of a complement of 34.

Citizenship

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in what circumstances a stateless person, married to a British citizen, working and resident indefinitely abroad, may acquire British citizenship.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 177].

A person, whether stateless or not, who is married to a British citizen may apply for naturalisation if he or she can meet the requirements set out in schedule 1 to the British Nationality Act 1981.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many face workers have returned to work at National Coal Board pits since the start of the current dispute; and what is the current output of coal.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures are not collected in the form requested. Since the dispute began there have been over 28,000 new faces reporting for work making a total of more than 75,000. The latest published figures for coal production are in the December edition of Energy Trends.

Coal Mines (Investment)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many coal mines have received less than £10 million of investment since May 1979; and of these how many have received less than £5 million and £1 million respectively.

Mr. Peter Walker: The National Coal Board informs me that since the beginning of the 1979-80 financial year 89 operational collieries have received investment, including an estimate of plant pool equipment allocated to individual collieries, of more than £10 million. 43 have received investment of between £5 million and £10 million and 37 investment of between £1 million and £5 million. No operational colliery has received less than £1 million. This represents a remarkable record compared with other European countries or with investment under previous Governments.

Power Stations (Sulphur Dioxide Emissions)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether the Government are taking steps to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions from power stations by encouraging energy conservation or electricity conservation; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what sum, as a proportion of expenditure and in total, his Department has spent in the last two years for which figures are available, and what sum it is planned to spend in the next two years, in order to investigate electricity or energy conservation as a means of reducing sulphur dioxide emissions from power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: Expenditure on means of reducing sulphur dioxide emissions from power stations is primarily the responsibility of the CEGB. My Department has supported work on promising advanced technologies that could reduce power station emissions. As announced on 24 January 1984, we are contributing, together with the BGC, CEGB and the NCB to two engineering design studies of commercial scale coal fired power stations using the slagging gasifier and a pressurised fluidised bed combustor. The Department's contribution totals £626,000 most of which will be spent in the next two years.

My Department has also contributed some £17 million over the past eight years to the construction and operation of the experimental pressurised fluidised bed facility at Grimethorpe under the auspices of the International Energy Agency. £6·5 million of this expenditure was incurred over the past two years. The NCB and CEGB announced last May that they will jointly finance continuation of this work over the next two years at a cost of £25 million. The energy efficiency campaign my right hon. Friend launched on taking up his present responsibilities would also make an important contribution to controlling emissions from power stations and from industry. This is aimed at persuading consumers to realise cost-effective energy savings equivalent to some 20 per cent. of present energy consumption.

Electricity Generation

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of electricity he estimates will be generated by nuclear power in 1990; and what proportion of electricity is currently generated by nuclear power.

Mr. Goodlad: In 1983 nuclear electricity contributed 17·8 per cent. of all electricity available from the United Kingdom public supply system. A comparable figure for 1984 is not yet available. The future nuclear share will depend on a number of factors, including the level of electricity demand. When the three AGRs currently being commissioned at Dungeness B, Heysham 1 and Hartlepool are fully operational, the proportion of the expected demand met by nuclear electricity could rise to about 21 per cent. With the completion and full commissioning around the end of this decade of the two further AGRs under construction, the contribution could reach about 25 per cent.

"Energy in a Finite World"

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Energy to what extent the Government have used information in, "Energy in a Finite World", produced by the International Institute for Applied System Analysis, as the basis for the Government's policy on nuclear energy and, in particular, on fast breeder reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: My Department has not used this study as a basis for its work.

Uranium (Namibia)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether the Central Electricity Generating Board's contract for uranium oxide from the Rossing mine in Namibia has now been fulfilled;

(2) what were the reasons for delays in supplies which led to the completion date for the Central Electricity Generating Board's contract for uranium oxide from the Rossing mine in Namibia being put back.

Mr. Goodlad: Deliveries under the contract were completed in December 1984. Supplies due to be delivered between 1976 and 1982 were rescheduled in the late 1970s because of early operational difficulties at the mine.

North Sea Oil (Price)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, before the meeting of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries ministers on 28 January, he will instruct the British National Oil Corporation to set an official price for North sea oil more closely related to spot market prices.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No.

Norwegian Oil (Price)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has concerning the recent decision of the Norwegian Government to bring the official price of Norwegian oil more into line with spot market prices.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: There is no official price for Norwegian oil. The Norwegian Government sets a norm price at which Norwegian production is valued for tax purposes but it is set retrospectively. I understand that Statoil has been discussing with its customers the price of its oil for December and January.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Information Technology

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the United Kingdom's balance of trade in information technology; and how many were employed in this field in each year since 1979.

Mr. Butcher: Using a definition of information technology, which covers office machinery, data processing equipment, telecommunications equipment, electrical instruments and control systems, radio and electronic capital goods, electronic components (including microelectronics and semi-conductors) and consumer electronics but excluding tapes, records, software and computer services, the figures for balance of trade are:

	Deficit £ million
1979	443
1980	356

Departmental Financial Support

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of total financial support from his Department was spent on (a) established industries and technologies and (b) new industries and technologies in 1979 and at the latest available date, respectively.

Mr. Butcher: The objective of the Department's support in this area is not to distinguish between new and established industries but to stimulate innovation and the use of the latest appropriate technology, in all industries. As a percentage of the total, but declining, expenditure of the Department of Trade and Industry, scientific and technological assistance offered has risen from 6·3 per cent. in 1979-80 to 21·4 per cent. in 1983-84. That is from £142 million to £342 million.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the share of the largest 100 United Kingdom manufacturing companies in (a) gross/net manufacturing value added, (b) total manufacturing employment and (c) total manufacturing assets in 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Butcher: Figures provided in the following table relate to the manufacturing activity of the top 100 enterprises in the private sector, defined in terms of their employment in manufacturing. No comparable estimates are available for the stock of manufacturing assets, but figures are shown for net capital expenditure incurred in each year. Estimates relating to 1983 are not yet available.

Share of total manufacturing activity accounted for by top 100 private sector enterprises (per cent.)

Source: annual census of production.

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many firms represented the upper half of retail sales in the United Kingdom in 1982.

Mr. Butcher: In 1982 the largest 138 individual companies accounted for one half of retail sales in Great Britain.

British Space Industry

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the Government's policy objectives concerning the use and exploitation of space and the development of the British space industry.

Mr. Butcher: The Government's primary objectives in space are to assist the development and maintenance of competitive industrial and commercial organisations able to produce and exploit space hardware, software and services, particularly in the fields of communications and remote sensing; and to make use of space techniques in its own activities, to maximum national benefit, for example by undertaking a balanced programme of research at the frontiers of knowledge in the major areas of space science. The Government pursue these objectives through a suitable combination of national and international programmes.

BL Corporate Plan

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place a copy of British Leyland's 1985 corporate plan in the Library.

Mr. Butcher: A review of BL performance in 1984 and the BL 1985 corporate plan will be placed in the Library in accordance with customary procedure when the Government's decisions on it are announced.

Civil Research and Development Expenditure

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will indicate the current level of civil research and development expenditure, expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: Civil research and development expenditure performed in the United Kingdom by all sectors of the economy was 1·8 per cent. of the gross domestic product in 1981, the latest available year. The information is obtained from an annual article on research and development expenditure published in Economic Trends, the latest was in August 1984.

British Aerospace Space Freighter

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what position he proposes to adopt in respect of the next European Space Agency Council meeting regarding the British Aerospace space freighter.

Mr. Butcher: British Aerospace has proposed an attractive concept for a versatile space platform — a "space freighter". Whether this should now be pursued as a planned European contribution to the international space station is one of the issues my hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Information Technology will be taking up at the forthcoming ESA Ministerial Council meeting.

European Space Agency

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his policy regarding the concept of a non-policy making administrative body as an alternative to a space agency in Europe.

Mr. Butcher: The Government believes that the European Space Agency has proved a successful and valuable organisation as presently constituted.

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the United Kingdom contribution to the European Space Agency since 1975; and what the level of this contribution is expected to be for 1985.

Mr. Butcher: United Kingdom contributions to the European Space Agency since 1975 have been as follows:

£ million

	DTI	*SERC	Met. Office	Total
1975-76	22·8	6·3	—	29·1
1976-77	31·5	6·8	—	38·3

The United Kingdom contribution to ESA for 1985-86 has not been finalised and may be affected by the outcome of the ESA Ministerial Council meeting next week. It is however likely that the total contribution will be slightly increased in 1985-86.

Independent Space Agency

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, prior to the European Space Agency Council meeting in Rome on 30 January, he will make a statement on his policy regarding an independent space agency for Britain.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Shipbuilding (Investment)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance in the form of subsidy and investment his Department is prepared to give to the state-owned merchant shipbuilding industry and to the associated construction of slow-speed marine diesel engines.

Mr. Butcher: £137 million of the external finance which the Department is providing to British Shipbuilders in 1984-85 is primarily to support merchant shipbuilding and engine building. For 1985-86 the Government have announced an EFL for the whole of British Shipbuilders of £36 million, after taking account of the expected proceeds of sale of the warship yards. A detailed breakdown of support specifically for slow-speed marine diesel engine building is not available.

CIVIL SERVICE

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what replies have been received by the central transfer unit from employees at Cheltenham regarding transfers of staff.

Mr. Hayhoe: The staff transfer unit does not enter into direct correspondence with individual employees regarding transfers. All negotiations on transfers from Cheltenham take place with the local deployment staff.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Store Cattle (Exports)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many store cattle were exported from Northern Ireland to other regions of the United Kingdom in each of the last three years.

Dr. Boyson: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

THE ARTS

Arts Funding

25. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will list the conditions attached to money for funding the arts given to the regions under the proposals contained in "The Glory of the Garden".

Mr. Waldegrave: The Arts Council has not yet finalised its grants to the regions under the "Glory of the Garden" proposals. Any conditions will vary from case to case.

National Gallery

26. Sir David Price asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts why the annual purchase grant for the National Gallery has been reduced from £3·33 million for 1984-85 to £2·75 million for 1985-86; and what is the real reduction in the purchasing power of the grant, given the anticipated level of inflation and the higher rate of increase in saleroom prices for major works of art

Mr. Waldegrave: In allocating the arts budget for 1985-86, my right hon. and noble Friend decided to give greater emphasis to the conservation and housing of collections than to new acquisitions. The National Gallery's net running costs provision will be increased by 5·3 per cent. above the current year; and it should benefit from the 15 per cent. rise in the overall museum and gallery building and maintenance programme. The real value of its purchasing grant will depend on future price levels of relevant works of art, which cannot be predicted.

Yorkshire Water Colour Society

Mr. Mason asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if he will arrange for an exhibition relating to the Yorkshire Water Colour Society to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall on 18 March 1985.

Museums and Galleries (Attendance Figures)

Mr. Faulds asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts whether he will publish in the Official Report the attendance figures for 1984 reported by the national museums and galleries in England, broken down to the individual institutions but comprising their outstations, with figures in each case of the percentage increase or decrease on the attendance figures for 1983.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 426]: The information requested is as follows:

	Estimated attendance in 1984	Percentage change from 1983
British Museum	3,467,044	+12·6
Imperial War Museum	1,365,888	+8·8
National Gallery	2,936,926	+1·4
National Maritime Museum	600,000	*
National Portrait Gallery	581,395	+24·2
Science Museum	4,510,103	−5·7
Tate Gallery	1,265,605	−0·3
Victoria & Albert Museum	2,079,204	−6·4
Wallace Collection	177,613	+0·2

* No quantifiable change.

The estimated figure for attendance at the Imperial War Museum includes visitors to the Cabinet war rooms in Whitehall which were opened to the public on 6 April 1984. Admission charges were introduced at the National Maritime Museum in April 1984, and the figure quoted is an approximate estimate based partly on the number of admission tickets sold, some of which cover more than one entrant or visit. Other museums record visitors manually, and in most cases the figures are regarded as being accurate to within about 5 per cent. This limits the interpretation of apparent annual changes in attendance, which may also be affected by other factors at individual museums and galleries.

EMPLOYMENT

Methyl Isocyanate

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the four places in the United Kingdom where methyl isocyanate is stored for research purposes; how much is stored at each location; in how many containers; what are the research purposes; and what precise controls are imposed by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will write to the hon. Member about the location and use of methyl isocyanate, as there are statutory restrictions on the public disclosure of such information. With regard to controls, work with methyl isocyanate is covered by the general duties of employers under sections 2 and 3 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974. The substance is subject to the Classification, Packaging and Labelling of Dangerous Substances Regulations 1984 and the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations 1984.

Children (Accidents)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest available figures of fatal accidents to children aged 16 years and under while at work, of major accidents among that age group at work, and of all reported accidents at work to children aged 16 years and under.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There were six fatal injuries in 1983 to children aged 16 years and under, at work or on Government training schemes, reported to inspectors of the Health and Safety Executive.

There were 510 major accidents and 3604 reported accidents in 1982, the latest year for which figures are readily available. These figures may exclude some accidents on government training schemes. Figures for cases reported to local authorities could not be gathered without disproportionate cost.

Children (Illegal Employment)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers were prosecuted by the Health and Safety Inspectorate for the illegal employment of children; and how many cases and convictions were involved for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The table shows details of prosecutions for illegal employment of children taken by the Health and Safety Executive's inspectors. Prosecutions taken by other authorities for the illegal employment of children are not reported to the Health and Safety Executive.

	Employers prosecuted	Informations laid*	Convictions

Homosexuals (Discrimination)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment how his Department monitors compliance with Recommendation 924 of the Council of Europe on discrimination against homosexuals.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have no obligation to comply with this recommendation.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to render unlawful discrimination in employment on grounds of homosexuality.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. This is a subject upon which widely differing views are held, and we do not consider that such legislation would command a sufficient degree of public support for it to be effective.

Strikes

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many working days were lost through strikes in 1984; if he will state the comparable figures for 1982 and 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Figures for 1984, together with the comparable figures for 1982 and 1983, will be published on 31 January in table 4.2 of the labour market data section of the January 1985 issue of the Employment Gazette, a copy of which will be placed in the Library.

Youth Training

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Employment, (1) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East of 14 January, Official Report, columns 35-36, about youth training scheme mode A schemes, whether he will list the proportion of payments made for vacated places in 1983-84 for which the maximum of £12 was adjudged payable;

(2) pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East of 14 January, Official Report, columns 35-36, whether he will publish the administrative cost of running the youth training scheme discretionary compensation scheme for vacated places in 1983-84.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The precise information requested is not available centrally, and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people were in training on the youth training scheme at the end of each month from April 1983 to August 1984, by mode; and how many young people were in training (a) on current year schemes and (b) on previous year schemes at the end of each month from September 1984 to the latest available month, also by mode.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Trade Union Subscriptions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has concerning the number of employees covered by union dues check-off systems in (a) the public sector and (b) the private sector.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information on the number of employees covered by check-off arrangements is not available. However according to the 1980 workplace industrial relations survey 65 per cent. of all public sector and 35 per cent. of all private sector establishments employing manual workers operated check-off arrangements. The corresponding figures for non-manual workers were 62 per cent. in the public sector and 18 per cent. in the private sector. A TUC survey in 1979 suggested that some 50 per cent. of union members were covered by check-off arrangements.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether he has any plans to introduce legislation on the subject of the union dues check-off system;

(2) what steps he intends to take to deal with abuses of the union dues check-off system;

(3) if he will introduce legislation to prohibit the automatic deduction by employers from the wages of employees of trade union subscriptions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Trade Union Act 1984 has already dealt with a serious abuse of the check-off system by making it unlawful for employers to deduct the political levy from the pay of trade union members who have notified them that they have contracted out. My right hon. Friend and I will be considering the whole question of deductions from pay as part of our current consultations on protection of wages.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what representations he has received recently concerning the union dues check-off system;

(2) what information he has concerning the number of reported abuses of the union dues check-off system; and how many of these cases resulted in criminal prosecutions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have recently received several representations from the director of the Construction Plant Hire Association about the collection of trade unions subscriptions by check-off, some of which have been passed on to us by the hon. Member for Macclesfield. We are not aware of any abuses of this system which have led to criminal prosecutions but there are problems associated with, for example, the deduction of compulsory, special union levies which have given cause for concern.

Youth Training Scheme (Leicestershire)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will request the Manpower Services Commission to re-examine the availability of resources for mode B schemes serving rural areas in Leicestershire and to sustain the provision at current levels.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission is currently finalising its plans for youth training scheme provision in Leicestershire for 1985-86. Mode B provision in the county in 1984-85 exceeded the demand from young people and in the light of that, and the availability of employer-based provision in mode A, some reduction in the number of mode B may be justified.

Melton Would Workers Scheme

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will request the Manpower Services Commission to maintain funding for the Melton Would workers scheme at a sufficient level to maintain 35 places for young people.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that plans for youth training scheme provision in Melton in 1985-86 have not yet been completed, but I would expect the Manpower Services Commission to seek as far as possible to meet the demand for places through employer-based programmes under mode A. This is likely to entail some reduction in mode B1 provision in the district but it is not yet clear where the reductions will fall.

Young Persons (Employment Statistics)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will publish for each Manpower

Services Commission area office in the south western region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds, and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December;

(2) if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the south eastern region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds, and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education colleges, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December;

(3) if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the north western region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds, and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December;

(4) if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the midlands region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds, and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December;

(5) if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the Yorkshire and Humberside region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December;

(6) if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the northern region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is as follows. It is derived from provisional forecasts of the position in December 1985 made by principal careers officers in the autumn of 1984 and must therefore be regarded as tentative. Principal careers officers have been asked to provide revised forecasts later this month in the light of the better information which is now available to them. There is insufficient information on which to base estimates of leavers from colleges of further education in each area.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are expected to enter the youth training scheme in 1985-86 on the basis of the eligibility rules announced on 12 November 1984; how many places are expected to be available; and how much the scheme is expected to cost.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On the basis of the eligibility rules announced on 12 November 1984, it is estimated that there are likely to be some 385,000 entrants to youth training scheme programmes in 1985-86. As to places, we are awaiting proposals from the Manpower Services Commission on the scale and balance of provision in 1985-86. As for costs, the supply estimate for 1985-86 will be published in March.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is his best estimate of the number of young people who would be eligible to join the youth training scheme in 1985-86 if it catered for all 16-and 17-year-olds who would otherwise be unemployed; how many places would need to be made available; and how much the scheme would cost.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As I said in my reply of 9 January 1985, at column 464, various proposals for the enhancement of provision for young people are currently being considered, but we are not yet in a position to provide estimates in the form requested.

Unemployment Statistics (Yorkshire)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the latest estimated unemployment rates for the areas covered by the job centre offices in (a) Hemsworth and South Elmsall, (b) Dewsbury and Batley, (c) Bradford inner city, (d) Leeds inner city and (e) Castleford-Knottingley.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. The latest rates for each travel-to-work area, together with the numbers unemployed and corresponding numbers for each local authority district, and job centre areas are available from the House of Commons Library.

Travel-to-Work Areas (West Yorkshire)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the reasons for reducing the number of travel-to-work areas in west Yorkshire from nine to seven; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The travel-to-work area boundaries have been revised to reflect the most recent country-wide data on travel-to-work patterns provided by the 1981 census of population. The methods used in this review are described in the supplement to the September 1984 edition of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library. The data used for the review show that some of the nine travel-to-work areas previously identified in west Yorkshire were no longer sufficiently self contained to qualify as travel-to-work areas.

Gas Leaks

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, in his review of the two serious gas explosions in a week, he will include in the matter whether there are sufficient telephone lines to gas offices to enable people to report leaks.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I understand that the British Gas Corporation believes that its existing arrangements are adequate but is keeping them under continual review.

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, following the two recent gas explosions, the Health and Safety Executive will review the extent of the smell in North sea gas to establish whether it is strong enough to give sufficient warning of leaks.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Gas Quality Regulations which require gas to have a distinctive smell are administered by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Energy.

The level and type of chemical stenching agent added to gas is such that gas leaks can be detected by smell at a concentration of gas in air which is a fraction of the concentration which will burn or explode. Experience has shown that any increase in the smell results in false alarms which could divert resources from real emergencies. The conclusions of the King report of 1977 were that the oderant used is satisfactory with regard to smell, impact and intensity and that any increase in odour level would not increase safety. The Health and Safety Executive believe this view is still valid.

Mrs. Rumbold asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, following the serious gas explosions in Mitcham and Morden, the Health and Safety Executive will review the nature of the advice given to householders when reporting a gas leak about minimising risk.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is the British Gas Corporation's responsibility to advise householders of the risks of the gas it supplies. I am advised that the corporation runs a regular publicity campaign in the press and on television to stress the importance of reporting gas leaks promptly and to advise householders of the action to take in an emergency.

A leaflet for consumers, 'Help Yourself to Gas Safety' is available from British Gas showrooms. The Health and Safety Executive will be putting out a revised leaflet, 'The Gas Regulations for Everybody's Safety'. Its message is that people should report suspected gas leaks promptly, they should turn off the gas supply, open the windows and ensure there is no source of ignition.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when Her Majesty's Government expect to make a decision on how long the Royal Air Force airlift will remain in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: We have agreed with the Ethiopian Government that the airlift should be continued to the end of March and that we shall review the position again nearer that time.

The Sahel

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current use of Hercules transport planes for the transport of grain to the Sahel; and if it is his intention to allow their use for the remainder of 1985.

Mr. Raison: Royal Air Force Hercules are distributing grain and other supplies in Ethiopia. The airlift in Ethiopia will continue and we will review the position again before the end of March. We do not think the direct provision of air transport would be the best use of our resources in most other countries in the Sahel, where we look to the relevant international agencies, to which we contribute, to organise it, if appropriate. Air transport is expensive but is justified when supplies are carried to areas that are otherwise inaccessible.

The Philippines

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much bilateral aid is given, directly or indirectly, by Her Majesty's Government to the Philippines.

Mr. Raison: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available, total disbursements amounted to £3,714,000 including £2,916,000 invested by the Commonwealth Development Corporation.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when payments are due to be completed by the Commonwealth Development Corporation of the sum of £6·4 million to the National Development Company-Guthrie project in Mindanao.

Mr. Raison: Payments are due to be completed not later than the end of 1985 but this date could be extended by agreement.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether recent incidents on the National Development Company-Guthrie plantation in Mindanao, such as the reported presence of the Lost Command on the plantation for several months during 1984, cause the Overseas Development Administration or the Commonwealth Development Corporation to reconsider their relations with the National Development Company-Guthrie.

Mr. Raison: No.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will place in the Library a copy of the Commonwealth Development Corporation report of its inquiry into allegations that, between May and September 1984, members of the Lost Command were regularly present at night on the National Development Company-Guthrie plantation in Mindanao, in apparent contravention of the conditions attached to the Commonwealth Development Corporation loan to the company announced by the Overseas Development Administration in January 1983.

Mr. Raison: The Commonwealth Development Corporation has assured me that it has inquired into the allegations of regular Lost Command presence at night on the plantation but could find no basis for them. No more detailed report by the CDC is available. The conditions in the agreement attached to the CDC loan stipulate that a security force shall be appointed, replacing the previous security arrangements, and shall be responsible for protecting employees; and also that the borrower shall take measures within its power to ensure that its employees shall be protected against harassment. There is, however, no practical way of ensuring that the project estate and the roads through it are closed against outsiders.

WALES

Companies (Financial Aid)

8. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications for aid have been received by his Department from companies intending to set up businesses in the South Wales valleys.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Since July 1975, when the Welsh Office assumed responsibility for regional selective assistance, 460 applications have been received in respect of new projects in mid-Glamorgan and the districts of Lliw Valley, Neath, Afan, Blaenau Gwent, Islwyn and Torfaen.

Housing Statistics

15. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many habitable dwellings he forecasts will be available in Wales in April 1986; and what was the corresponding figure for April 1984.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In April 1984 there were some 1,105,000 dwellings in Wales. It is estimated that there will be about 1,120,000 by April 1986.

Employment Statistics

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the components of employment change in the electrical engineering industry in Wales between 1970 and 1983.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Details of employment change within the electrical engineering industry are given in the table. These figures are for the period June 1971 to September 1981, the closest dates to those requested for which information is available.

Change in total employment in the electrical engineering industry

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the changes in employment in Wales in the electrical engineering industry, the coal industry and the steel industry between 1970 and 1983.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Details of employment change in the requested categories are given in the table. These figures are for the period June 1971 to September 1981, the closest dates to those requested for which information is available.

Improvement Grants

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will issue advice to local authorities in Wales to the effect that payment of improvement grants funded from the housing investment programme should be made preferably on the production of an invoice from a value added tax registered builder; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We are concerned that grant-aided work should be undertaken by reputable builders and that concern will be reflected in the consultation paper which we hope to publish soon about the future of the grant system.

Industrial Floor Space

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the provision of industrial floor space in Wales for each year since 1967.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information on provision of industrial floor space by local authorities and the private sector is not kept centrally. I will write to the hon. Gentleman on factory provision by the Welsh Development Agency, the Development Board for Rural Wales and the Cwmbran Development Corporation and that of the former Welsh Industrial Estates Corporation and Mid Wales Development corporation.

School Leavers

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the Welsh region, and for (a) 16-year-olds, *(b)*17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information requested on school leavers is as follows. It is derived from provisional forecasts made by principal careers officers in the autumn of 1984 and must therefore be regarded as tentative. Principal careers officers have been asked to provide revised forecasts later this month in the light of the better information which is now available to them. There is insufficient information on which to base estimates of leavers from colleges of further education in each area.

Milk (Outgoers Scheme)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many dairy farmers in each county in Wales have taken advantage of the outgoers scheme for milk producers; what volume of milk this represents in each county; and what is the total compensation payment identifiable with these cases.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The following table gives the fullest breakdown available and shows the position as at 14 January 1985:

Divisional Office	Producers accepted offers	Quota surrendered (million litres)	Payments Over 5 years (£ million)
Caernarfon (Gwynedd)	34	1·8	0·2

SCOTLAND

Education

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to seek powers to remove education and the employment of teachers from the control of local authorities in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to seek powers to remove education and the employment of teachers from the control of local authorities in Scotland.

A9 (Dornoch)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to the answer of 16 January, Official Report, column 321, he will provide a breakdown of how much of the £11 million expenditure on the A9 north of Dornoch and of the similar expenditure on the A9 south of Dornoch will in each case fall in 1984-85, 1985-86, 1986-87, 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90, respectively; and if he will further break down the year-by-year analysis by scheme.

Mr. Ancram: Given the various stages reached in preparing the respective schemes, it is not possible at this time to provide such detailed breakdown of costs. The starting dates of schemes, and hence expenditure on them in any particular financial year, will depend on the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures and the availability of finance within the Scottish trunk road programme. The proposed improvements to the A9 to the north and south of Dornoch, together with the estimated total costs and stages reached, is as follows:

Scheme	Estimated Cost (£ million November 1984)	Stage reached
(North of Dornoch) A9
Allt na Cuile	0·75	Land acquisition, almost complete. Start, when funds available.
Portgower-Greenpark	1·40	Reappraisal of scheme design recently completed. Economic assessment awaited from Region.

Scheme	Estimated Cost (£ million November 1984)	Stage reached
Crackaig-Culgower	1·70	Draft road orders published—objection being considered. Economic assessment awaited from Region.
Mound bridge	1·70	Draft plans being considered.
Dunbeath diversion	2·50	Draft road orders published—objections being considered.
Helmsdale-county boundary	1·80	Draft road orders in preparation.
Windyhouse-Borgue	1·00	Reappraisal of design being carried out.
(South of Dornoch) A9
Garrick Bridge-Tain	0·91	Land acquisition procedures being finalised. Possible 1985 start if funds available.
Alness Bypass	3·83	All objections withdrawn. Land acquisition procedures being finalised. 1985 start expected.
Ardgay Culverts	0·20	Draft order for land acquisition in preparation.
Logie Easter-Newfield	0·83	Scheme design being considered.
Newfield-Garrick bridge	0·95	Draft road orders in preparation.
Broomhill-Logie Easter	4·42	Draft road orders in preparation.

Dornoch Firth Crossing

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the design work on the Dornoch Firth crossing to be completed.

Mr. Ancram: As detailed design work can be finalised only after the making of the orders for the line of road, navigation and acquisation of land, I cannot at present forecast a design completion date. It is my Department's intention to seek tenders for the bridge structure on a design-and-build basis.

Housing Authorities (Compensation)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what extra sum would require to be paid out to housing authorities under section 3 of the Housing (Financial Provisions) Scotland Act 1978 to compensate authorities if interest rates continue at their present level until 31 March.

Mr. Ancram: The Housing Support Grant (Scotland) Variation Order 1985 was laid before the House on 11 January and will be debated on 23 January. This variation order seeks to increase the amount of HSG payable to appropriate authorities for 1984-85 by £10·1 million reflecting interest rate assumptions at the time the order was laid. If the most recent movements in interest rates are sustained, a further variation order may in due course be required. It is not yet possible to calculate the amount of such a variation order.

Concessionary Fares

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the proposals on travel concessionary fares arising from the White Paper on buses in respect of the elderly, disabled and school children aged 14 to 16 years.

Mr. Ancram: A number of hon. Members and others have expressed views about the consequences of our proposals for concessionary travel. We have made it clear that local authorities' power to provide concessionary travel schemes will continue basically unchanged.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Support

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out the scales of parental contribution for students for the years 1983-84, 1984-85, and 1985-86 (proposed) in money and in real terms.

Mr. Brooke: The parental contribution scales in money terms are as follows:

Residual income	Parental contribution
	1983-84	1984-85	*1985-86
£	£	£	£

25,000	1,752	2,803	3,774

* Proposed

Notes:

1. In the lower table incomes and contributions have been repriced according to the value of the Retail Price Index at September of the relevant year. Inflation to September 1985 is assumed to be 4·5 per cent.
2. In practice, contributions at the top of the scales would be limited by a student's maintenance requirements less any minimum award payable.

Soil Survey

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many new scientists were taken on by the Soil Survey of England and Wales in each year from 1970 until 1984.

Mr. Brooke: The information is as follows:

Number of new scientists taken on by the Soil Survey

Financial year	Number
1970-71	9
1971-72	4
1972-73	4
1973-74	4

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many of the organisations and individuals which responded to the recent consultative document on corporal punishment were in favour of a parental exemption scheme; and how many were opposed to such a scheme.

Mr. Dunn: Those who were consulted were not asked for views on the desirability of an exemptions scheme. The purpose of the consultation was to invite comment on the practical implications of such an exemption scheme. Most of those who volunteered a view about the desirability of exemption arrangements did so in a variety of critical terms.

Deaf Children (Teacher Training)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received critical of the proposals of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers relating to the training of teachers of deaf children, or those with impaired hearing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received more than a thousand letters critical of the recommendation of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers that the mandatory requirement for teachers of deaf and partially hearing pupils to possess a specialist qualification should be removed and fewer than a hundred letters critical of the proposal that specialist initial teacher training courses for teachers of the deaf should be phased out. My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales are considering their response to these and other recommendations of the advisory committee's report.

Teachers (Appraisal)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to receive the report on teaching staff appraisal schemes and their application which he has commissioned.

Mr. Dunn: The Department is negotiating a contract with the Suffolk local education authority to finance a research project to investigate the range of current approaches to performance appraisal in industry, commerce, the public services and in education services in other countries. It is expected that the project will run from early January to 30 April 1985, and that the Department will receive an initial report during May.

Students (Vocational Courses)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the preparation given by the certificate of prevocational education course to students intending to proceed to vocational courses.

Sir Keith Joseph: The framework specification for courses leading to the CPVE was published only on 11 January, and the first courses—apart from some pilot schemes currently in operation—will not be available until September 1985. I believe, however, that the CPVE framework is designed so as to prepare young people effectively to further vocational study, where appropriate. Progression arrangements to such courses are a key issue, still to be resolved in detail, and the continued endorsement of the CPVE by the holder of my office will depend on progress being made in negotiations between the Joint Board for Pre-Vocational Education and the vocational examining bodies.

School Files (Parental Access)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he intends to take to give parents access to school files concerning their children.

Mr. Dunn: None.

O and A-level Results

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list (a) the percentage of students in each year obtaining five or more O-level passes and (b) the percentage, taking the available age group and not just those in education, achieving two or more A-levels for each local education authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is not readily available. The percentages of maintained school leavers obtaining five or more higher grade passes at O-level/CSE and two or more A-level passes are as follows. Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

School Premises

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied that the regulations issued by his Department in 1981, No. 909, are adequate to safeguard school playing field provision per pupil in any circumstance of a falling school roll.

Mr. Dunn: Yes.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he will urge every local education authority to make school premises available for use outside school hours and in the holidays;

(2) whether he intends further to encourage schools to offer the community shared use of sports facilities.

Mr. Dunn: As my right hon. Friend stated in reply to a question by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) on 4 March 1983, consistent encouragement has been given for the community use of maintained school premises, including sports facilities; and he hoped that local authorities would continue to promote such use so far as practicable within the resources available to them. This remains the position.

As my right hon. Friend further stated in the course of a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 13 June last, results of the Department's survey of shared and extended use of schools in 1983 which followed up an earlier survey in 1978-79 suggest that levels of use have been maintained or improved, and show that sports users continue to be the group most likely to make regular use of both primary and secondary school premises. The statistical bulletin giving the full results of the survey will be published by the Department shortly.

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what acreage of school playing fields have been sold for building development since 1981.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected by the Department.

School Allocations (Parental Choice)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on how many occasions he has received representations from parents against the allocation by local education authorities of their children to (a) primary and (b) secondary school places for the years since 1981; and on how many of those occasions he gave a direction to the local education authority concerned under section 68 of the Education Act 1944 on the grounds that he was satisfied that it was acting or proposing to act unreasonably in relation to (i) primary schools and (ii) secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: Detailed records are not kept of all the many representations of varying substance received on various matters. In 1984, however, about 150 representations raised issues on school admissions—almost wholly in relation to secondary schools—that warranted further investigation, but in no case were the circumstances found to be such as to enable my right hon. Friend to exercise his limited powers of intervention under section 68 of the Education Act 1944.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science on how many occasions since June 1982 local education authorities have applied to him under section 37(3) of the Education Act 1944 for directions as to which school should be named in a school attendance order in relation to (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools; and on how many of those occasions the school directed by him to be named in the order was that selected by the parents in relation to (i) primary schools and (ii) secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: On 1 July 1982, section 37(3) of the Education Act 1944 was superseded by new local arrangements for determining these questions under the Education Act 1980.

Schools (Fire Insurance)

Mr. Hawksley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what guidance his Department issues to voluntary aided schools concerning the arrangements for insuring their buildings against fires; if this guidance has recently been changed; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on his Department's refusal to provide 85 per cent. of the capital cost of the rebuilding of the burnt down St. Mary's Roman Catholic aided primary school, Madeley, Shropshire.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend expects the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools to make appropriate arrangements for the insurance of their premises against fire and other hazards. At the request of Shropshire county council, the Department is reviewing its decision not to include St. Mary's voluntary aided primary school, following its destruction by fire, among the major capital projects which may start in 1985-86.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Soil Survey

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report the verdict of his priorities board on the Soil Survey of England and Wales.

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on Friday 18 January 1985 at column 248.

Soya Beans

Mr. Gregory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantities of soya beans were imported in each of the last five years; and what were their values and countries of origin.

Mrs. Fenner: The following table shows the information requested:

Store Cattle

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many store cattle were imported from the Republic of Ireland in each of the last three years.

Mr. MacGregor: The numbers of store cattle imported into the United Kingdom from the Republic of Ireland in each of the last three years are as follows:

(thousand head)

1982	1983	9184
125	123	123

The figure for 1982 includes an estimate of 10,000 head for unrecorded imports in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list any restrictions which are placed on imported store cattle from the Republic of Ireland.

Mrs. Fenner: Under common EC conditions designed to prevent the introduction of disease into Great Britain from other states, store cattle imported from the Republic of Ireland must be tested for brucellosis, tuberculosis and in certain cases enzootic bovine leukosis and be certified to have come from herds free of these diseases. The cattle must also be examined for evidence of other infections or contagious diseases and be certified to have been imported from a holding in an area clear of foot and mouth disease and bovine brucellosis during the preceding three months. Transport conditions are also laid down that are designed to eliminate the risk of contact with animals of a lesser health status.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what restrictions apply to store cattle exported from Northern Ireland to other parts of the United Kingdom; and if he will list them.

Mrs. Fenner: Under conditions designed to prevent the introduction of disease into Great Britain, store cattle imported from Northern Ireland undergo testing for brucellosis and tuberculosis and are certified to have come from herds free of these diseases. The cattle are also examined for evidence of other infections or contagious diseases and kept separate from animals that do not satisfy these conditions.

Chemicals

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will provide a list of those chemicals approved by his Department for farmers and growers in the years 1955, 1960, 1970, 1980, and the latest available date;

(2) if he will show the number of chemical products approved by his Department for use by farmers and growers in each year from 1955 to the latest available date.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested cannot be extracted readily. Since the introduction of the agricultural chemicals approval scheme in 1961 the annual booklet "Approved Products for Farmers and Growers" has listed all products officially approved for efficacy. A copy is placed in the Library on publication. Although early editions are no longer generally available they can be obtained through the Library. The 1985 edition will be published early next month.

In 1961 "Approved Products" listed 400 proprietary products using 50 active ingredients, in 1984 these figures were 670 and 200 respectively.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will provide the latest available information he has on the extent of pesticide treatment of crops in England and Wales by crop group, area of crops grown, in hectares, and the percentage of those crops so treated;

(2) if he will provide the latest information available to him on types of pesticides used in agriculture and horticulture, as an estimated annual average, by pesticide group, spray hectares, and tonnes of active ingredients per year.

Mrs. Fenner: Information collected by my Department and that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on the use of pesticides, including insecticides, on crops and in other agricultural situations is regularly published in the "Pesticide Usage Survey Report" series. These published reports include detailed accounts of pesticides used on particular crops and summaries of total pesticide usage over given periods.

Fishing Vessels

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and amounts of de-commissioning grants awarded by the European Economic Community to fishing vessel owners in the United Kingdom who have removed their fishing vessels from the United Kingdom fishing fleet and (b) the types and ports of registration of those vessels.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 199]: The European Commission reimburses 50 per cent. of the cost of decommissioning grants paid in accordance with Community regulations. No payments have so far been made by the Commission but reimbursement is being sought in respect of 62 vessels on which grants amounting to £7,259,944 have been paid. The types of vessel and ports of registration are as follows:

NORTHERN IRELAND—Nil

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and types of fishing vessels constructed, in the years 1979 to 1984, with the assistance of grants and loans from the Sea Fish Industry Authority and (b) the yards where they were constructed.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 199]: The information requested is as follows:

2. In all cases grant aid has been approved; loan assistance from the authority will have been sought in some, but not all cases.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government are opposed to the acquisition of nuclear weapons by other states.

Mr. Luce: As one of the original parties to the non-proliferation treaty and a depositary power, we support the view expressed in the preamble to that treaty that "the proliferation of nuclear weapons would seriously enhance the danger of nuclear war."

In particular, we believe that the introduction of nuclear weapons into areas where they do not form part of the existing security arrangements could destabilise such regions and threaten global security.

Unilateral Nuclear Disarmament (UN Vote)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the United Kingdom abstained in the recent United Nations General Assembly vote on a resolution noting with satisfaction a study on unilateral nuclear disarmament measures; and why there was no common North Atlantic Treaty Organisation position on the resolution.

Mr. Luce: We abstained on United Nations General Assembly Resolution 39/148A because we believe that the study, which was produced by four neutral and non-aligned representatives and presented to the Secretary-General, lacked balance and depth and did not advance progress towards nuclear disarmament. The NATO alliance is not represented as a formal group within the UN system. Each member state is free to vote as it wishes. Several of our allies, including Belgium, Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy also abstained.

Hong Kong (Refugee Camps)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further steps he has taken to improve conditions in the closed camps in Hong Kong following the British Refugee Council's report.

Mr. Luce: As I said in my answer of 17 December to my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall), at column 30, I shall be discussing with members of the Asia Committee of the British Refugee Council those recommendations in the council's report "Behind Barbed Wire" that fall within the responsibility of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. A meeting has now been arranged for 22 January. I can, however, tell the hon. Gentleman that, in relation to one recommendation in the report, the Hong Kong Government had decided before the report appeared that Vietnamese refugees in open centres who claim to have close relatives in a closed centre may live with them in the closed centres if they wish.

Hong Kong (Remanded Persons)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the length of time that each of the 12 women on remand in custody in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984 have been in prison;

(2) what is the length of time spent in prison by each of the three girls aged 14 to 20 years on remand in custody in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984; and what are their ages and the offence with which they are charged;

(3) how many (a) men, (b) women, (c) boys and (d) girls were on remand in custody in Hong Kong at the latest available date; and how many in each category have been in custody for (a) one to two months, (b) two to three months, (c) three to four months, (d) four to five months, (e) five to six months, (f) six to nine months, and (h) over one year, respectively;

(4) what are the ages, offences with which charged and the length of time in custody of each of the 59 14 to 20-year-old boys in custody on remand in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984;

(5) what were the ages, offences and sentences of each of the 348 14 to 20-year-old boys in prison in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984;

(6) if 14 to 20-year-old (a) girls and (b) boys in prison in Hong Kong are kept separate from adult prisoners;

(7) if he will list all the penal establishments in Hong Kong, indicating in each case the category, the number and type of prisoner it is designed for and the number it accommodates;

(8) what facilities exist in Hong Kong for mentally disturbed offenders;

(9) what were the ages, offences and sentences of the nine 14 to 20-year-old girls in prison in Hong Kong on 17 December 1984;

(10) why a prisoner in Hong Kong has waited for 327 days to come to trial.

Mr. Luce: The information required will take some time to obtain. I will arrange for details to be published in the Official Report.

Grenada

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what continuing contribution the Government intend to make to the self-defence and policing of Grenada.

Mr. Renton: By the end of 1984 we had spent £600,000 on aid to the Grenada police. We intend to continue to make assistance available. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development informed the House on 30 October 1984 at column 905, that we had offered to finance on grant terms, at an estimated cost of £1·2 million, shore facilities for coastguard services in six eastern Caribbean islands, including Grenada.

Laos

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what account was taken of the United Kingdom's role as co-chairman of the 1962 Geneva conference on Laos when deciding to close the United Kingdom embassy in Laos.

Mr. Luce: We took fully into account all relevant considerations in reaching our decision, on financial ground, to close Her Majesty's embassy in Laos and accredit a non-resident ambassador to Vientiane.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance Her Majesty's Government have offered the Laos Government to clear up the 3 million tons of bombs deposited by United States planes on Laos territory between 1965 and 1972.

Mr. Luce: None. We are not aware of any request for assistance and have no plans to offer it.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which other European Economic Community member countries have diplomatic representation in Laos.

Mr. Luce: France and the Federal Republic of Germany, amongst our European Community partners, have diplomatic representation in Laos.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the annual cost of maintaining the United Kingdom embassy in Laos; and what will be the estimated annual cost of administering the United Kingdom's Laos interests from Bangkok.

Mr. Renton: The latest available annual figure for the cost of maintaining Her Majesty's embassy in Laos is £133,063. The annual cost of administering our interests in Laos from Bangkok will depend on the number visits to Vientiane by embassy staff at Bangkok. It will certainly be substantially less than the cost of maintaining a Resident embassy in Laos.

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason Her Majesty's Government are proposing to close the embassy in Laos.

Mr. Renton: The closure of Her Majesty's embassy in Vientiane and another nine posts is part of a balanced package of reductions aimed at keeping Foreign and Commonwealth Office expenditure for 1985-86 within the figure planned and approved by Parliament. In choosing the posts to close the aim has been to minimise the overall effect on United Kingdom interests while maintaining a reasonable degree of geographical balance. In all cases we have looked carefully at the political, commercial and consular interests involved.

Diplomatic Representation

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which countries with populations of 3 million or less Her Majesty's Government have no resident diplomatic representation.

Mr. Renton: The following 14 countries:

Albania
Bhutan
Central African Republic
Djibouti
Dominica
Equatorial Guinea
The Federal and Islamic Republic of the Comoros
Guinea—Bissau
Mauritania
Republic of Cape Verde
Suriname
Togo
Tuvalu
Western Samoa

Embassies

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what countries other than Laos in which the United Kingdom presently has diplomatic representation it is proposed to close the United Kingdom embassy.

Mr. Renton: Her Majesty's embassy in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, is also being closed.

International Year of Youth Conference (Delegation)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the cost of the British Youth Council's proposed sending of a delegation to the Moscow International Year of Youth conference later in the current year; and how much of this will be met, directly or indirectly, from public funds.

Mr. Renton: The British Youth Council does not yet know what it would cost it to attend the Moscow festival of youth and students. At present it proposes to try to fund the despatch of two representatives to Moscow, with observer rather than delegate status. Such a delegation would be part of a delegation from the Council of Europe national youth committees. Since August 1984 it has been made clear to the British Youth Council that we cannot agree to the use of public funds to support the Moscow festival. This remains our position.

If it can secure the necessary funds, the British Youth Council also hopes to send representatives to the youth festival being organised by the Jamaican Government in Kingston.

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action has been taken to fulfil the United Kingdom's international obligation under the non-proliferation treaty to achieve a comprehensive test ban treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The preamble to the NPT recalls the determination expressed by the parties to the 1963 partial test ban treaty to achieve a comprehensive test ban treaty. We remain committed to seek progress towards such a treaty. It is essential, however, first to resolve outstanding problems on verification to ensure that such a ban can be properly enforced. We will continue to work for this at the conference on disarmament in Geneva.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the outcome of talks between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on article 6 of the non-proliferation treaty; and why the United Kingdom was not present at these talks.

Mr. Luce: Talks last November between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics addressed nuclear non-proliferation matters. The details are a matter for the Governments concerned. For its part, the United Kingdom holds regular consultations on non-proliferation with other countries, including the USA and the USSR.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that the projected sale of civil nuclear technology to China for a pressurised water reactor nuclear power station is in accordance with the United Kingdom's obligations under the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Luce The Foreign and Commonwealth Office scrutinises all proposals for nuclear related exports from the United Kingdom to ensure that they are in accordance with our non-proliferation policy and with our obligations under the NPT. The sale by GEC of the turbines for the Guangdong power station is fully in accord with both.

Mr. Yasser Arafat

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any request since 19 December 1984, either orally or in writing, that Yasser Arafat should be permitted to enter the United Kingdom in the near future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such request.

Argentina (Arms Sales)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Spain regarding the proposed sale by Spanish companies of frigates and related arms to Argentina; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We continue to make our views on the supply of arms to Argentina known to our allies, but the results of our discussions must remain confidential to the Governments concerned.

Iran (Human Rights)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress the special representative of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights has made with his study of the situation in Iran.

Mr. Luce: The special representative, Mr. Andres Aguilar, was appointed on 19 October 1984, and is due to present his report to the 41st session of the United Nations

Commission on Human Rights which will meet in Geneva from 4 February to 15 March 1985. Mr. Aguilar has not yet been able to visit Iran because the Iranians have not responded to appeals for their co-operation in this respect. If he is unable to visit Iran before February, his report will rely on information received from Governmental and non-governmental organisations on the human rights situation in Iran.

The Philippines

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the sale to the Philippines Government of items such as vehicles which may be used by the Philippines Government to repress the civilian population.

Mr. Luce: It is our policy not to authorise the export of licensable equipment where in our judgment it would be likely to be used for internal repression. This would apply to the Philippines, as to any other country. All licence applications are examined on a case by case basis taking into account all relevant factors including human rights considerations.

Republic of Ireland

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been received from the Government of the Republic of Ireland concerning the shooting incident in Belfast on 14 January; what response was given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Irish Foreign Minister made representations to Her Majesty's ambassador in Dublin on 15 January. The ambassador took note of them and made clear that he could make no comment on the incident until the facts had been established. He also explained our stated policy on the security forces in Northern Ireland.

Southern Africa

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Billericay of 19 December, Official Report, column 296, about southern Africa, what steps he intends to take to ensure the peaceful resolution of the region's problems through diplomacy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We envisage no major initiatives but shall continue to take appropriate steps within the framework of established policy. This is kept under close review.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Christmas message of Sir Rex Hunt about the attitude of Falkland Islanders to domestic issues in Britain was issued with his authority.

Mr. Renton: The Civil Commissioner does not require authority to comment on the attitudes of Falkland islanders.

ENVIRONMENT

Greater Manchester Council (Staff)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many staff are employed by Greater Manchester council; and how many staff are employed by the district councils in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department receives information from Greater Manchester council and the district councils in Greater Manchester on a regular quarterly basis through the joint manpower watch survey. In addition, information about the numbers of staff employed by Greater Manchester council has been received in response to a request under section 5 of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984. The total numbers employed (full-time and part-time) by Greater Manchester council and each district within Greater Manchester are as follows:

Number of staff at September 1984

Authority	Full-time	Part-time
Greater Manchester	6,099	1,379
Bolton	7,784	4,168
Bury	4,049	2,669
Manchester	24,595	12,103
Oldham	6,407	3,145
Rochdale	6,341	3,660
Salford	7,979	4,926

Figures exclude police officers, cadets, traffic wardens and police civilians, and staff of magistrates courts and probation and after-care services which are not directly employed by the local authorities.

Homes Insulation Scheme

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the budget allocation for each local authority for the homes insulation programme for 1985-86; and how this compares with 1984-85.

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction announced housing investment programme allocations — which include the homes insulation scheme—to local authorities in England for 1985-86 on 20 December at column 76, in response to a question to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale).

Copies of the letter and the schedule of initial allocations to each local authority were placed in the Library, where previous years' allocation schedules are also available.

The 1985-86 allocations are initial allocations: that is the first year in which a reserve has been established from which further homes insulation scheme allocations may be made in accordance with demand.

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total budget allocation for 1985-86 for the homes insulation programme; and how this compares with 1984-85.

Sir George Young: Local authorities' housing investment programme allocations in England for 1985-86 include £31 million for the homes insulation scheme. For 1984-85 the allocation is £35 million, though latest estimates suggest this may not all be spent.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Deposits

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what share of deposits was accounted for, respectively, by (a) London clearing banks, (b) Scottish clearing banks, (c) Northern Ireland clearing banks, (d) other banks and (e) building societies in absolute and percentage terms in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As far as such figures are available, they are shown in the table. The figures for United Kingdom banks show the stock of sterling deposits from all sources held on 14 December 1983 and 12 December 1984. Figures for Northern Ireland clearing banks are included with other banks in the table; no separate figures are available. The figures for building societies show the stock of shares and deposits, time deposits and certificates of deposit from all sources at the end of each calendar year.

Direct Taxation

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage change has taken place between 1979 and the current financial year in direct taxation paid by a person on average earnings; and how this compares to the change for a person on five times average earnings.

Mr. Moore: For a married man on average earnings with two children, the percentage of earnings taken in income tax less child benefit is expected to be 12·9 per cent. in 1984-85 compared to 14·4 per cent. in 1978-79. Corresponding estimates for a married man with two children on five times average earnings are 39·9 per cent. in 1984-85 and 47·1 per cent. in 1978-79.

Tax Thresholds

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much income tax thresholds could be raised (a) at no overall extra cost to the Exchequer, (b) at an extra cost of £1,500 million, and (c) at an extra cost of £3,000 million assuming the following changes: (i) abolition of all existing personal income tax allowances in favour of a flat rate fixed amount tax deduction for every taxpayer, which would be fully transferable between husband and wife, (ii) tax reliefs for mortgage interest, private pensions, and so on, to be similarly limited to the standard rate of income tax and (iii) wife's investment income to be treated as her own for income tax purposes.

Mr. Moore: I regret that the estimates could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Currency Levels

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has regarding the percentage change in the relevant national currency vis-a-vis the United States dollar as between 1 January 1979 and each subsequent 1 January to 1985 for each of the European Economic Community countries, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland, Austria, Spain, Norway, Sweden, India, Malaysia and Singapore.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

Her Majesty's Stationery Office

Mr. Freud asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total value of orders placed with Her Majesty's Stationery Office during 1984 by or on behalf of local libraries.

Mr. Hayhoe: About £2·2 million, of which half is met by Government grants.

Taxation

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the cost to the Revenue of treating husbands and wives separately in respect of tax relief for mortgage interest payments while retaining the rule that such relief applies only to the taxpayer's only or main residence and to a limit of interest on a £30,000 mortgage on any one house.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the loss of tax revenue if the investment income of husband and wife were taxed independently.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the loss of tax revenue if the limits on contributions to pensions from earned income were applied to husbands and wives when both are earning as if they were two single persons.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the abolition of the investment income surcharge has reduced the cost of taxing the investment income of husband and wife independently.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Taxation Categories

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many taxpayers fall into each of the following categories: (a) single, (b) married couple, husband only working, (c) married couple, wife only working, (d) married couple, both earning, (e) single pensioners and (f) married couple pensioners.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Dependent Relative Relief

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost of the dependent relative relief.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of the dependent relative relief if its value were raised to that of the additional personal allowance, assuming the existing conditions for reduction.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Allowances

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much would be transferred to non-taxpayers if the value of the married personal allowance and the additional personal allowance were used to increase child benefits; and what proportion of that value this transfer represents.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current estimate of the gain to the Revenue from the abolition of the married personal allowance (a) in total and (b) to persons below retirement age.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current estimate of the gain to the Revenue from the abolition of the additional personal allowance (a) in total and (b) to persons below retirement age.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Gay's the Word Bookshop

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 9 January to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, Official Report, column 488, when the staff concerned in the Gay's the Word bookshop case first consulted the 1984 edition of "British Books in Print".

Mr. Hayhoe: Following the hon. Member's question, which mentioned "British Books in Print", the staff concerned first consulted the 1984 edition on 13 December 1984.

Plant and Machinery (Balancing Allowances)

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of restoring the position prior to the Finance Act 1974 whereby balancing allowances were given in respect of unrelieved expenditure on plant and machinery disposed of during the accounting period.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Trident

Mr. O'Neill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will include in his commentary on defence public expenditure programmes in the public expenditure White Paper an indication of the impact of the cost of the Trident project at the date of publication of the White Paper on the future composition of the remainder of the defence budget.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Relocated Employees

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if the Inland Revenue is to publish a statement of practice on the treatment of payments to relocated employees for income tax purposes; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what publicity the Inland Revenue gives to its practice regarding the tax treatment of payments to employees moving to higher cost housing areas; if he will place the publicity material in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: An Inland Revenue press release and statement of practice were published on Friday 18 January. Copies have been placed in the Library.

DEFENCE

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what yearly payment is to be made to cover Mr. Peter Levene's pensions contributions following his appointment as chief of defence procurement.

Mr. Butler: Details of Mr. Levene's terms of employment have not yet been finally settled.

Vehicle Depot, Hilton (Study)

Mrs. Currie asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the feasibility study on the vehicle depot, Hilton, Derbyshire.

Mr. Lee: The feasibility study into the possible use of a private contractor to carry out the functions at present undertaken by the directly employed staff at the RAOC vehicle depot, Hilton, is still in hand. I hope to be in a position to make a more substantive statement on the outcome of this investigation in the spring.

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the duties of his Department's police in respect of civilian staff employed by his Department.

Mr. Lee: Ministry of Defence police officers have authority to act as required in respect of civilian staff and all other persons on Ministry of Defence premises in the United Kingdom. The duties of the force, in common with other police forces, include the prevention of crime, the detection and arrest of offenders if crime is committed and the protection of life and property.

Type 22 Frigates

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now announce his decision upon the placing of the two orders for type 22 frigates.

Mr. Lee: No decision on the placing of these orders has yet been taken..

Departmental Property (Security)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Defence what level of spending he proposes to devote to the improvement of security in his Department's property in the next two years.

Mr. Stanley: Final decisions have not yet been taken by Ministers on the provision in estimates for 1985-86 and in the long-term costing for 1986-87 for major works services, including major new physical security installations at Ministry of Defence establishments and units. In addition, the cost of security measures (which cover a very wide field) are not always separately identifiable from major works projects of which they often form part. Information about more minor works services and installations is not held centrally and could not be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Service Personnel (Premature Retirement)

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many officers, non-commissioned officers and other ranks, respectively, applied for premature voluntary retirement in each of the armed services in the calendar year 1984; and what were the equivalent figures for each year since 1975.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows:

	1975	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984*

Notes:
* To 30 November.
Figures for Servicemen include non-commissioned officers, for whom separate records are not kept.
Figures for Army Servicemen were not recorded centrally prior to 1979.
Figures are for males only.

Service Personnel (Costs)

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the approximate per capita annual cost of (a) a Regular Army soldier, (b) a Territorial and (c) a member of the Home Service force, taking account of total employment costs, including remuneration, pension (where applicable), training and personal equipment costs.

Mr. Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Reforger Exercises

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is intended to exercise elements of the 501st Tactical Missile Wing at Greenham common, as part of the Reforger exercises.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any United States units taking part in Reforger exercises in Europe will come to Britain.

Mr. Stanley: Two United States army units will deploy to military training areas in the United Kingdom during the exercise.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States F1-11 aircraft based in Britain will take part in January's Reforger exercises.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether A-10 aircraft of the United States Air Force in Suffolk will be taking part in the January Reforger exercises.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any British units will take part in the January Reforger exercises.

Mr. Stanley: No, but support facilities will be made available to the United States forces at two RAF bases in the Federal Republic of Germany.

SOCIAL SERVICES

National Radiological Protection Board

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total amount of public money paid to the National Radiological Protection Board in 1983 and 1984; and how much it will receive in 1985.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Net funding by our Department was £3·6 million in 1983-84 and £3·8 million in 1984-85. Final decisions have not yet been taken on the allocation for 1985-86.

Oglesby Report

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a list detailing those recommendations of the Oglesby report which have been implemented by the Government and those recommendations which still await implementation.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) on 17 December 1984 at column 46. I hope to announce shortly the Government's response to those recommendations of the report which have not yet been implemented.

EC Anti-poverty Programme

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are Her Majesty's Government's objections to the European Commission's latest anti-poverty programme proposals.

Mr. John Patten: The Government are party to the decision of the Council of Ministers of Labour and Social Affairs of 19 December 1984 that a second European Community programme to combat poverty should take place from 1985 to 1988. The United Kingdom will be participating fully in the programme.

Epilim

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will take steps to secure the inclusion in the British data sheet for Epilim of the psychiatric adverse reactions currently included in the United States Food and Drugs Agency data sheet.

(2) if he will take steps to secure the inclusion in the British data sheet for Epilim of the precautions regarding infertility currently included in the United States Food and Drugs Agency data sheet.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were transferred from (a) non-contributory invalidity pension and (b) housewives non-contributory invalidity pension to the severe disablement allowance in November 1984.

Mr. Newton: An estimated 163,000 and 58,600 respectively. The first figure is probably underestimated but the extent of this will not be known until the results of the annual statistical exercise are available next year.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) favourable and (b) unfavourable decisions on applications for severe disablement allowance have been made to date.

Mr. Newton: 139 and 320 respectively, as at 15 January.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for severe disablement allowance have been received to date from (a) men, (b) single women and (c) married women.

Mr. Newton: As at 18 December 1984, some 9,500 new claims for severe disablement allowance had been received. A breakdown by sex and marital status of the claimant is available only in respect of those claims that have been decided. For these the figures are 138, 78 and 243 respectively.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will classify refusals of severe disablement allowance to (a) men, (b) single women and (c) married women according to the following reasons (i) over pension age, (ii) age group not phased in, (iii) not incapable of work, (iv) failed the 80 per cent. test and (v) other.

Mr. Newton:

Reason for disallowance	Men	Single and divorced women and widows	Married women
Over pension age	95	57	120
Not incapable of work	2	—	1
Disablement condition not satisfied	—	—	3
Other	24	10	8
TOTAL	121	67	132

Separate information is not available on the number of applications received from those in the second phase age group. These are not normally subject to a formal disallowance. The application is returned with a letter of explanation and a request to resubmit at the appropriate time.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will classify awards of severe disablement allowance to (a) men, (b) single women and (c) married women according to whether they (i) were exempt from the 80 per cent. test on grounds of age, (ii) were passported to the 80 per cent. test or (iii) passed the 80 per cent. test.

Mr. Newton: The available information on new awards of severe disablement allowance as at 15 January is as follows:

	Men	Single and Divorced women and widows	Married Women
Exempt from disablement condition (under 20 when incapacity arose or claim links with NCIP*/HNCIP†)	11	8	13
Passported to disablement condition	5	3	97
Disablement condition satisfied	1	—	1
	17	11	111

* Non-contributory invalidity pension.
† Housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension.

Invalidity Pension

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for (a) non-contributory invalidity pension and (b) housewives non-contributory invalidity pension were received in each month during 1984; how many of each were successful; and how many applications for housewives non-contributory invalidity pension failed on account of (i) the incapacity test and (ii) the household duties test.

Mr. Newton: I regret that information is not available in the form requested.

The table shows the number of claims for non-contributory invalidity pension and housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension received each month during 1984 and the number of awards of housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension made in the same periods. No details are available of the number of awards of non-contributory invalidity pension in any particular period other than those relating to the special exercise to invite claims from people already drawing supplementary benefit to which I referred in my reply of 23 October to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) at columns 570-571. These figures are shown separately in the table.

Over the last year 197 married women claiming housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension failed the incapacity test and 2,355 failed the household duties test.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what were the total numbers of (a) private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 and (b) beds they contain; and if he will give the figures for each region;

(2) what were the total numbers of (a) private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 which contain operating theatres and (b) beds they contain; and if he will give the figures for each region;

(3) what is the total number of private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 which contain both operating theatres and (a) pathology departments and (b) radiology departments; and if he will give the figures for each region;

(4) if he will list the registered nursing homes with operating theatres in England on 31 December 1983 giving in each case the number of beds and the health district and region;

(5) if he will give for 31 December 1983 and for each health district, the total number of beds in private hospitals, nursing homes and clinics registered under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 which contain operating theatres, the total number of state registered nurses working in those institutions and the appropriate whole-time equivalent figure and the total number of all nursing staff working in those institutions and the appropriate whole-time equivalent figure;

(6) if he will give for 31 December 1983 and for each health district, the total number of beds in private hospitals, nursing homes and clinics registered under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975, the total number of state registered nurses working in those institutions and the appropriate whole-time equivalent figure and the total number of all nursing staff working in those institutions and the appropriate whole-time equivalent figure;

(7) what are the total numbers of (a) nursing staff and (b) medical practioners employed (i) by all the private hospitals, homes and clinics registered on 31 December 1983 under section 3 of the Nursing Homes Act 1975 and (ii) by those private hospitals, homes and clinics which contain operating theatres; and if he will give the figures for each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have not yet received and compiled the detailed information requested. When it is available, I will reply to the hon. Member.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the total number of Part III accommodation places provided in; (a) private homes and (b) voluntary homes on 31 March.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. The available data, relating to the position at 31 March 1984, are as follows:

Number of residents supported by local authorities in registered homes for the elderly and disabled

	No.
Voluntary homes	12,634
Private homes	1,574

Further details are given in the Department's publication "Residential Accommodation for the Elderly and for Younger Physically Handicapped People", a copy of which is held in the Library.

Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the cost charged to his Department by private nursing homes for each individual resident within the Wigan area whose fees are paid by his Department;

(2) how many residents there are in the Wigan area health authority who are inmates of private nursing homes and whose fees are paid by his Department.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Member has in mind those residents in private nursing homes whose fees are being met in part or in whole by supplementary benefit. I understand that there are no such residents in the area covered by the Wigan local DHSS office.

Private Hospitals

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the private hospitals offering acute medical and surgical care which treat National Health Service patients under contractual arrangements with health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The private institutions offering medical and surgical care under contractual arrangements with health authorities in 1983 are as follows, as reported by the authorities, within the NHS regions in which they are located. The list includes care provided in various aspects of patient service including medical, surgical, pre-convalescent and post-operative, diseases of chest, rehabilitation and terminal care.

NHS (Contractual Arrangements)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for 1983 for each region and for England as a whole the number of deaths and discharges among, and the number of beds occupied on a given date, by patients receiving treatment under contractual arrangements with institutions outside the National Health Service; and if he will break down these figures into the category of (a) medical, (b) surgical, (c) pre-convalescent and post operative, (d) convalescent, (e) geriatric, (f) diseases of the chest, (g) maternity, (h) mental illness, (i) mental handicap, (j) rehabilitation, (k) terminal care and (l) others.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is given in the tables.

Residential Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for 1982-83 and 1983-84 the total payments by local authorities to voluntary and private organisations providing residential care to (a) the elderly, (b) children, (c) young handicapped, (d) mentally handicapped adults, (e) mentally handicapped children and (f) the mentally ill.

Mr. John Patten: Local authorities personal social services expenditure on residential care services provided by voluntary organisations and registered private persons is as follows:

England

£ million cash

	1982-83	*1983-84
Services principally for:
Elderly	35·5	36·4
Children	48·1	46·5
Younger physically disabled	29·6	30·0
Mentally handicapped adults	20·7	24·4
Mentally handicapped chidren	4·9	5·6
Mentally ill	5·0	5·4

* Provisional.

In addition local authorities made general contributions to voluntary organisations of £30·4 million in 1982-83 and £33·5 million in 1983-84. Some of these organisations will provide residential care services.

Pay Beds

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether pay bed charges are fixed so as to make a surplus for the National Health Service after deducting the costs of treating the private patients.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The charges are set to reflect the estimated long run marginal cost of treating patients in those hospitals to which the charges relate.

Private Patients

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those regional health authorities which take into account districts' income from private patients when determining resource allocations to district health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect full and detailed information about the basis of allocations of resources by Regions to Districts but I am not aware of any that take income from private patients into account.

Chrysoidine Dye

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment has now examined the report, "Maggots Dyed with Chrysoidine: A Possible Risk to Anglers", which appeared in the October edition of the British Medical Journal, column 289, a copy of which he has received; what were its conclusions; if its review on the harmful effects of chrysoidine dye is now complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Committee on Carcinogenicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment considered the report to which the right hon. Member refers at its meeting in December 1984.

The committee recognised the although clinical evidence such as that presented in the report and other literature does not rule out a link between exposure to chrysoidine and bladder cancer, there is no positive evidence to support such a hypothesis. Both people referred to in the report were heavy cigarette smokers and heavy smoking is known to be associated with a number of forms of cancer, including that of the bladder. Indeed, the report's author recognised that cigarette smoking, as well as chrysoidine, may have been instrumental in the development of the bladder cancers.

The committee emphasised that it is not possible to draw conclusions about cause and effect from isolated cases and stressed that the available epidemiological and experimental evidence showed no relationship between chrysoidine and cancer, either in workers handling the substance or in anglers.

The committee will continue to pay careful attention to any clinical, epidemiological or experimental evidence regarding the possible harmful effects of the dye chrysoidine and will review their advice to the Department as necessary.

Limited List Prescribing

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the names of those senior officials of his Department who have met to discuss his limited list proposals with registered charities, community health councils, family practitioners' committees, health service unions and professional bodies, and dispensing chemists; and if he will state in each case (a) the name of the organisation with whom the meeting took place, (b) its date and (c) its duration.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No meetings on our limited list proposals have been held with registered charities, community health councils, family practitioner committees or Health Service unions. Various meetings have taken place with bodies representing the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the pharmaceutical industry. No useful purpose would be served by listing the names of officials involved.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the products containing folic acid and vitamin B12 were added to the list of vitamins that will continue to be prescribable on the National Health Service from 1 April; how many other preparations have so far been added to the list announced on 8 November 1984; when they were added; and what is the overall effect of these additions on the prescribed savings of £100 million.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It was never our intention that prescriptions for vitamin B12 or folic acid should be affected by the limited list proposals. The final list of drugs to remain available on the National Health Service in each of the groups covered by the proposals will not be determined until our consultation with the professions and industry is complete.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give an estimate of the total number of patients likely to be affected by his limited list proposals as they now stand either by (a) having to pay for preparations which they obtain free at present or (b) having to switch to an alternative preparation to the one they receive now.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Whilst some patients might choose to pay for their medicines there will be no need for anyone to do so as there will be an adequate range of effective medicines available on the NHS. The final list of drugs to remain available in each of the groups covered by our limited list proposals will not be determined until consultation with the professions and industry is complete. It would be misleading to estimate at this stage the number of patients who might need to switch to alternative medicines still available under the NHS.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he proposes to permit general practitioners to have a final say in prescribing a proprietary drug if he is satisfied it has greater efficacy than its generic equivalents on the prescribed list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This will not be necessary. We propose to produce a list of drugs prescribable on the National Health Service which will meet all clinical needs. These will not necessarily be "generic equivalents" to proprietary drugs but will be a range of alternative medicines which are both effective and cheap.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many drugs are prescribed under the National Health Service; what percentage of the total are likely to be affected by the proposed limited list; and of the drugs presently prescribable, what percentage of the total are proprietary drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the number of pharmaceutical companies likely to be significantly affected by the proposed limited prescribing list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have always known that the full effect on individual companies could not be estimated sensibly until the limited prescribing list is finalised.

Warnock Report

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown of the £194,000 cost of producing the Warnock report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The breakdown is as follows:

Expenses of chairman and members	20,600
Departmental staff, accommodation and services	173,400
Total	194,000

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make available in the Library copies of all those responses which he has received following the publication of the Warnock report that are listed in his reply of 9 January, Official Report, columns 503-5.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will arrange for this to be done where the organisation concerned is willing for its response to be made public.

Population Statistics

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the current percentage of the population who at some stage live in two-parent two-child households.

Mr. John Patten: It is estimated that at the time of the 1981 census about one quarter of the population of England and Wales were members of two-parent two-child families. Approximately a further one-fifth of the population were members of two-parent families with 3 or more children.

No precise estimates are available for the proportions of persons who did not belong to such families at the time of the census but who, either as a child or a parent, belonged to a two-parent two-child family before the census or who will belong to such a family in the future. However, over a whole life-time, whether as children or parents, much the greatest part of the population will at some stage either live or have lived as part of a two-parent two-child family.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate of the percentage of children who grow up in families with three or more children.

Mr. John Patten: Families numbering three or more children have accounted for about half of all children born to the group of women who are currently reaching the end of the childbearing ages. Although children do not necessarily spend all the years of their childhood in the family unit in which they are born, this figure provides a reasonable estimate of the proportion of children who at some stage are part of a family of three or more children.

Bassetlaw District Hospital

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many patients have had to be transferred from Bassetlaw district hospital because the intensive care unit is not being used;

(2) how many vacancies there are at Bassetlaw district general hospital, Worksop, for consultants and junior doctors, respectively; how long these posts have been vacant; and what measures are being taken to fill them.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect this sort of detailed local information centrally. The hon. Member may wish to seek information from the chairman of the Bassetlaw health authority.

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many operations have had to be postponed at Bassetlaw district hospital due to a shortage of doctors; and when permission will be given to the hospital to train junior doctors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EEC Anti-poverty Programme

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will announce details of his Department's arrangements for inviting applications for funds from the European Economic Community anti-poverty programme and of the timetable for decision making on applications;

(2) if he will list the steps he is taking to encourage the voluntary sector to participate in the European Economic Community anti-poverty programme;

(3) if he will list the consultations his Department has initiated to ensure that the United Kingdom participates to the maximum extent in the European Economic Community anti-poverty programme.

Mr. John Patten: Officials of this Department and of other relevant Departments in the United Kingdom, representatives of voluntary organisations and individual experts have played a full part in the numerous consultations arranged by the European Commission on its proposals for a second European community programme to combat poverty. The Council of Ministers agreed on 19 December 1984 that a second programme would take place in the four years 1985-88 with a maximum EC expenditure of 25 million ecu (approximately £15 million). There have been meetings with individuals and organisations in this country from central and local government, institutions and relevant voluntary organisations to discuss arrangements for the programme and for United Kingdom participation. The Department will shortly announce arrangements and the timetable for the submission of applications for the limited funds available from those voluntary and other organisations who are most likely to be interested in undertaking action research projects under the programme and whose activities relate most closely to the themes put forward by the Commission.

"Women and the Health Service"

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which of the recommendations issued in the report entitled "Women and the Health Service" published by the Women's National Commission, a copy of which has been sent to him, he intends to implement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are now considering this report which we have only just received.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take to check the growth rates of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are considering the public health implications of AIDS and what further steps might be taken to control it. We have established an expert advisory group to advise the health departments in the United Kingdom, whose members will include experts on all aspects of the disease. Their advice will be valuable in assisting the formulation of a strategy for prevention and control.

There is at present no vaccine against AIDS or specific treatment, but general preventive measures and health education have a major part to play in controlling the disease.

Interim guidelines drawn up by the Advisory Committee on Dangerous Pathogens on the safe handling of AIDS patients have recently been published jointly by our Department and the Health and Safety Commission. These set out the measures which should be taken to protect clinical and laboratory staff who come into contact with patients suffering from AIDS or with specimens taken from them. We are taking steps to reduce the risk of the spread of AIDS through blood transfusion and the use of blood products. We are strengthening our efforts to dissuade those in AIDS high-risk groups from donating blood, and our revised leaflet "AIDS Important New Information for Blood Donors" will be distributed individually to all donors. We are also considering the need to screen blood donations for the HTLV III antibody. Supplies of heat-treated factor VIII for haemophiliacs will shortly be made available to the NHS from the Central Blood Laboratories Authority.

To promote greater awareness of the risks of the disease, the Health Education Council has produced a leaflet "Some facts about AIDS" which will be made widely available to individuals in at-risk groups and the public generally.

Internationally, we are in touch with the Centers for Disease Control in the United States and the World Health Organisation AIDS Reference Centre in Paris, which have considerable data on the disease. Research in this country is proceeding through five projects funded by the Government through the Medical Research Council.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if acquired immune deficiency syndrome is a notifiable disease; and if sufferers are able to discharge themselves from hospital voluntarily.

Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take immediate steps to make acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This disease is not at present notifiable under the Public Health (Control of Disease) Act 1984 but each case is reported to the communicable disease surveillance centre, which monitors incidence in the United Kingdom. Patients with Aids can discharge themselves from hospital voluntarily. Making the disease notifiable would not alter this situation unless a local authority exercised its discretionary powers under the 1984 Act to ask a justice of the peace to make an order detaining a patient in hospital to prevent the spread of the disease. We are however reviewing the public health implications of making the disease notifiable.

Pendlebury Children's Hospital

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate how many representations he has received about proposals to close the cystic fibrosis unit at Pendlebury children's hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have had representations from five hon. Members and from two patients against closure of a cystic fibrosis unit at the Royal Manchester children's hospital. I understand, however, that the district health authority does not propose to close the facilities for patients suffering from cystic fibrosis, but to alter arrangements within the hospital so as to improve services for them and for other patients. If it decides to go ahead with these changes, they will consult locally in the normal way.

Cystic Fibrosis

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the number of cystic fibrosis sufferers who have to pay for prescriptions;

(2) if he will estimate the cost of exempting cystic fibrosis sufferers from prescription charges in 1984-85.

Mr. John Patten: I understand the Cystic Fibrosis Research Trust believes there to be around 1,200 sufferers from cystic fibrosis aged 16 and over. All would be liable to pay charges, but a number of these are likely to be exempt from charges on financial or other medical grounds.

The cost of exempting those not currently exempt would be small. However it would be unfair to single out one group for exemption and to accept all the claims we have received would cost more than we can ask the NHS to take on at present.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many specialist units for cystic fibrosis sufferers exist in England and Wales; how many and which of them are within the north-west region; what advantages flow from the operation of these units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish an estimate of the number of sufferers from cystic fibrosis (a) within the north-west region and (b) England and Wales;

(2) if he will publish an estimate of the number of sufferers from cystic fibrosis in England and Wales aged over 16 years and over 21 years at the latest available date and in 1974, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: Information is not collected centrally about the number, age distribution or location of sufferers from cystic fibrosis, which occurs about once in every 2,000 live births. However, it has been estimated that in 1984 there were up to 6,000 people suffering from this condition in the United Kingdom.

Cancer Screening Facilities

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what resources he intends to make available for the purpose of advancing screening facilities for breast and cervical cancer and spina bifida babies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is for health authorities to establish priorities for the development of these services within the resources we make available to them for their services as a whole.

Up-dated guidance has recently been issued to them on the priority to be given to particular groups of women within the screening programme for cervical cancer. We are funding a major programme of research to determine the value of breast cancer screening and will consider its future development in the light of the results of the trials which should begin to become available in 1988.

The report of a working group set up under the chairmanship of Sir Douglas Black to advise on screening for neural tube defects including spina bifida was sent to health authorities in 1979. Our Department endorsed the group's general conclusions that rapid progress towards a national screening service might be unwise in view of some remaining uncertainties about the benefits and risks and the costs entailed. We have subsequently funded further research in this field.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply by his right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health of 16 January, Official Report, column 170, what were the sources of the series of figures for women of all ages screened for cancer; how the figure for 1982 was calculated; and whether the figure for 1983 was an estimate.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The figures for women of all ages given in the table to which the hon. Member refers were summarised from returns SBH 140 which are received annually from health authorities. Figures for all the years shown are actual numbers, rounded to the nearest thousand.

Severe Weather Payment

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the meteorological data upon which the Chief Adjudicating Officer based his decision to authorise an exceptionally severe weather payment in East Anglia and southern England for the week ended 12 January; if he will give the comparable data for Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The chief adjudication officer based his advice to local adjudication officers on criteria published in paragraphs 7426-7459 and Appendix 19 of the 'S' manual (a copy of which is in the Library) using temperature data obtained from the Meteorological Office. The data requested by my hon. Friend are set out in the table. The table also includes the trigger points for the areas concerned: these are points at which the chief adjudication officer considers the "exceptionally severe weather" condition in the regulations to be satisfied. Trigger points have been fixed for the areas covered by each of 17 weather stations in Great Britain, following discussions with the Meteorological Office and on the basis of an analysis of the coldest periods over a number of years and other advice.

Source : Meteorological Office.
Note:
A "degree day" is the daily difference in degrees between a base temperature level at which it is estimated a building requires heating (15·5°C) and the 24-hour mean outside temperature. It is a widely used measure of temperature over time.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Chief Adjudication Officer has decided on any further authorisation of severe weather fuel payments to those on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Chief Adjudication Officer is advising that the conditions for activating regulation 26 of the Supplementary Benefit Single Payment Regulations, relating to exceptionally severe weather, have been satisfied in any part of Great Britain in the week ended 19 January.

Mr. Whitney: The Chief Adjudication Officer has today decided to advise local adjudication officers that in the week ending 19 January the conditions for award of payments under single payment regulation 26 on the grounds of exceptionally severe weather have been satisfied in 5 weather station areas covering parts of Wales, the midlands and the south of England. The DHSS local office areas concerned are as follows.

The criteria on which the chief adjudication officer bases his advice are published in paragraphs 7426-7459 and Appendix 19 of the S manual (a copy of which is in the Library), and he applies them using temperature data obtained from the Meteorological Office. People eligible for supplementary benefit may therefore be entitled to single payments towards the cost of extra fuel they have had to use because of the cold weather. The normal rules governing entitlement to single payments apply, and any capital over £500 is taken into account in calculating any amount due. We are publicising the help which is available in the areas concerned and leaflets explaining how to claim can be obtained from local social security offices. Decisions on whether individuals are entitled to such payments are a matter for the independent adjudicating authorities.

Health Authorities (Managers)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the persons whose appointment to National Health Service general manager posts he has declined to approve, the posts they had applied for and his reasons for his rejection.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My advice to health authorities on their appointment of individual candidates to the post of general manager is, and should remain, confidential.

Benefits

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his estimate of the amount of Government expenditure (a) on supplementary benefit, (b) on housing benefit and (c) on child benefit in 1985-86;

(2) what is his estimate of the amount of Government expenditure on unemployment benefit in 1985-86.

Mr. Whitney: The latest estimates of expenditure in 1985-86 are:

	£ million
a. supplementary benefit	6,607
b. housing benefit*	2,889
c. child benefit	4,435
d. unemployment benefit	1,611

* Excluding rate rebates, which are not classified as public expenditure.

West-Midlands RHA (Consultants)

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost of the review by outside consultants of the functions and working of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information on the cost of the review is not yet available. A review of the kind envisaged should offer up opportunities for really worthwhile improvements in the management of health services for the benefit of patients. It need not be costly and costs will be met from within the management budget of the regional health authority.

Pre-school Playgroups Association

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce the amount of his Department's grant to the Pre-school Playgroups Association for 1985-86.

Mr. John Patten: The Pre-school Playgroups Association has not yet applied to the Department for grant-aid in 1985-86, though we expect to receive an application fairly soon. Once received, any application would be considered as quickly as possible.

Pharmaceutical Companies (Profits)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what decision he has reached regarding the maximum rate of return to be permitted to pharmaceutical companies supplying drugs to the National Health Service; what assessment he has made in reaching his decision of the future research and development requirements of those companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are still considering the changes to be made within the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme from 1 April.

Drugs (Prices)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the retail prices of valium and diazepam.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Valium (diazepam) is available only on prescription. The cost to the National Health Service of the most commonly used strength and pack size is as follows:

Strength	Pack size	Drug	Price
5 mg	1,000 tablets	Valium	£13·62
5 mg	1,000 tablets	Diazepam	£1·50

Surrogate Mothers

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East on 17 January, if he will immediately issue guidelines to all health authorities concerning the handling of cases involving surrogate motherhood; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am aware of my hon. Friend's concern about surrogate motherhood, but I have nothing to add to the answer to which he refers. Unless the expectant mother drew the attention of the hospital to the precise circumstances of her pregnancy, a health authority could have considerable difficulty in distinguishing between surrogate mothers and any other expectant mothers.

Itinerants (Emergency Shelter)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take to provide emergency shelter during the current period of exceptionally severe weather for those sleeping rough in London.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 18 January at column 260. There are presently vacant beds in five of the eight London resettlement units.

Itinerants (Statistics)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has of the numbers of (a) hospital admissions and (b) deaths as a result of exposure arising from sleeping rough in London since the beginning of 1985.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his most recent estimate of the number of people sleeping rough in London.

Mr. John Patten: No statistics are collected of the number of people sleeping rough in London. As I explained in my reply on 18 January at column 260 to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), accommodation for the homeless is mainly a matter for the local authorities who have specific duties under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977.

EMPLOYMENT

Trade Union Subscriptions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has concerning the total annual amount collected under union dues check-off systems in (a) the public sector and (b) the private sector.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None.

Unemployment Statistics

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has as to the percentage change in (a) unemployment and (b) the number of people in employment as between 1 January 1979 and each subsequent 1 January, or for the most recent figures, the latest available in each of the European Economic Community countries, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Switzerland, Austria, Spain, Portugal, Norway and Sweden.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 22 January 1985

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Justices of the Peace (Disabled Persons)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Attorney-General what is the number of registered disabled people who have been appointed justices of the peace; and over what period this number applies.

The Attorney-General: The information sought is not available.

ENVIRONMENT

Royal Parks (Cyclists)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further consultations are planned by the Royal Parks Department regarding access to royal parks by cyclists.

Mr. Macfarlane: There are no plans for further consultations, but my Department is always ready to consider suggestions for improvement which are consistent with the needs for other park users.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the number of housing units regarded as difficult to let possessed by each housing authority in England; and if he will indicate what percentage these figures represent of the council-owned housing stock in each case.

Sir George Young: Local authorities' 1984 housing investment programme returns included, for 1 April, numbers of the dwellings that they owned within their own areas, which they classed as difficult to let. Numbers reported are not necessarily comparable as authorities' criteria may differ. No dwellings were reported difficult to let by 161 authorities; the figures for the other authorities are as follows:

International Garden Festival

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many temporary jobs and how many permanent jobs were created by the international garden festival in Liverpool.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: In addition to the 200 to 300 people working on the construction of the international garden festival at any one time between autumn 1981 and spring 1984, around 500 people were directly employed in the operation of the festival itself. Many other jobs, some temporary, others permanent, were created indirectly by the festival elsewhere on Merseyside.

It is too early to say how many permanent jobs will result from the success of the festival.

Audible Intruder Alarms

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the operation of the code of practice on noise from audible intruder alarms 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. The code of practice, which offers advice on how to avoid or minimise disturbance from the prolonged ringing of burglar alarms, was issued to supplement the provision of part III of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 which enable local authorities and magistrates' courts to control noise nuisance. As a code of practice approved under the Act, it serves to guide local authorities and magistrates' courts in the exercise of their powers, but does not itself have the force of law. I have no reason to believe that the code is unsatisfactory; if my hon. Friend has evidence of difficulty I will of course consider it.

Resource Allocations

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which Government Departments use his Department's list of programme and partnership authorities for the allocation of resources; in what ways; and if he will provide a breakdown of the additional allocations that have been made to such authorities for the financial years 1982-83, 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Sir George Young: The list is used primarily in the distribution of urban programme resources, to which my Department, the Department of Education and Science, the Department of Health and Social Security and the Department of Transport contribute. The list of districts designated under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978, including partnership and programme authorities, is also used to give additional weightings to the generalised needs index scores of authorities which determine, in part, their housing investment programme allocations. Allocations to partnership and programme authorities made through the urban programme for the years in question are shown in the table. Because of the local discretionary element in HIP allocations, it is not possible to disaggregate the additional allocations made to partnership and programme authorities as a result of the weighting of their GNI scores.

† Figures include urban programme expenditure by metropolitan counties and in some cases health authorities in those areas. They do not include urban development grant or derelict land grant.

‡ The figures for London Docklands and Merseyside authorities exclude allocations to the London Docklands and Merseyside Development Corporations; they also exclude other special projects to promote economic regeneration, improve housing and the environment, and develop the tourist potential of Merseyside.

‖ Figures for newly designated authorities and programme authorities which were formerly other designated districts include allocations under the traditional urban programme for 1982-83, but exclude urban programme resources received in those years for continuing projects approved under earlier traditional urban programme circulars.

¶ Former "Other Designated Districts", given programme status on 15 February 1983.

● New designation announced on 15 February 1983.

Preserved Railways

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what account is taken by the Development Commission of the activities and potential of preserved railways in its overall plans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The Development Commission is charged with assisting the social and economic development of rural areas. It has established priorities of helping to increase the number and range of job opportunities and of encouraging the maintenance and where possible, improvement of services, including transport, in rural areas. To the extent that preserved railways do or could help meet these objectives, the commission would be willing to consider whether it can provide assistance to them.

Construction Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to reduce the level of unemployment in the construction industry in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: I refer the hon. Member to the Government's public expenditure plans for 1985-86 to 1987-88, published today. These offer the best prospects for the industry, through the Government's policies of tight control of public spending and encouragement of the private sector. These lead to a 4 per cent. growth in real terms in construction industry output in 1984.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the effect of cutbacks in house building and the imposition of value added tax on building alterations on the construction industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the speech by my right hon. Friend on 19 December at column 305. The level of overall capital investment in the economy, public and private, was last year at a record level of around £55 billion. This year it is expected to reach another new record level of around £60 billion. The construction industry is sharing in that investment. The maintenance of tight control on public expenditure and measures taken in the 1984 Budget on VAT are part of the Government's overall economic strategy which has led to a 4 per cent. growth in real terms in the construction industry in 1984.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the effect on the construction industry of cutbacks in local government spending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State discussed the recent report of the National Economic Development Office on the infrastructure at a meeting of the council on 9 January. A number of representations were made to my right hon. Friend on that occasion. My right hon. Friend and I hope to meet the group of eight next month. Overall capital investment, public and private, was a record of around £55 billion last year, in which the construction industry shared.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many families were on local authority housing waiting lists in England and Wales at the latest available date.

Sir George Young: The Department does not collect information on council housing waiting lists in England. For Wales, the hon. Member is referred to right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Dr. John Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends introducing legislation to strengthen the provisions of sections 28 and 29 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin [pursuant to his reply, 20 November 1984, c. 150]: I understand that proposals for strengthening the provisions of the Act in relation to sites of special scientific interest are to be included in the Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill introduced by the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark).

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can provide any figures on the total amount of borrowed funds for which mortgage tax relief is provided on the interest, but which are not devoted to house purchase or improvement.

Mr. Moore: It is a condition of mortgage interest relief that the loan must be used for house purchase or improvement.

EC (Unemployment and Gross Domestic Product)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will rank, for the most recent available date, the regions within the European Economic Community by (a) total unemployment rate and (b) gross domestic product per inhabitant.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Comparable data are not available for individual regions within the European Community, but an approximate ordering of unemployment by country is possible using data provided by the statistical office of the European Community. A ranking for all EC countries other than Luxembourg and Greece for the third quarter 1984 is as follows.

Comparisons of gross domestic product per inhabitant are very sensitive to changes in the exchange rate. A set of estimates designed to overcome this problem is published by the OECD using purchasing power parities. A provisional ranking for 1984 is shown in the following table.

(a) Unemployment Rates (per cent.) Third Quarter 1984

Fringe Benefits

Sir David Price asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the basis of the assumptions made in the autumn statement 1984, what would be the estimated cost of raising the £8,500 year threshold for the assessment of fringe benefits by directors and higher paid employees to offset the effects of inflation since this threshold was introduced; and what would be the new figure for 1985-86.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Plant and Machinery (Writing Down Allowance)

Mr. Grylls asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of changing the writing-down allowance on plant and machinery from 25 per cent. on the reducing balance to (a) 25 per cent. straight line and (b) 20 per cent. straight line.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Allowances

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current estimate of the gain to the revenue from the abolition of the married personal allowance (a) in total and (b) to persons below retirement age.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 321]: The estimated yield from reducing the married man's allowance and married age allowance to the levels of the corresponding allowances for single people would be about £4·1 billion in a full year at 1984-85 levels of income. £3·6 billion of this estimate is in respect of taxpayers under 65.

Mr. Silvester asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current estimate of the gain to the revenue from the abolition of the additional personal allowance (a) in total and (b) to persons below retirement age.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 320]: The estimated yield from abolishing the additional personal allowance would be about £140 million in a full year at 1984-85 levels of income. Approximately £1 million of this is in respect of taxpayers over 65.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police (Unmarked Vehicles)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of unmarked operational vehicles used by the Metropolitan police are equipped with (a) two-tone horns or sirens and (b) detachable blue lights or beacons.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that of the 675 unmarked operational vehicles used by the Metropolitan police, 81 (12 per cent.) are, or will soon be, equipped with both an emergency sound system and a detachable blue beacon. A further 13 have an emergency sound system only.

BBC (Television Licence Fee)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the television licence fee is paid over to the British Broadcasting Corporation; and how the balance is accounted for.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The BBC's home services grant is determined by deducting the expenses of administering the licensing system and investigating complaints of interference to broadcasting from the gross television licence fee revenue. In 1983-84 the total licence fee revenue collected was some £763 million and the grant paid to the BBC £704 million. The major expenses which fell to be deducted from the gross licence revenue in the same year were:

	£ million
Payments to the Post Office for collecting licence fees and enforcing the licensing system	51
Costs incurred in investigating complaints of interference to broadcasting	5·5
Home Office expenses (including cost of anti-evasion publicity campaign)	2·5

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Private Industry (Investment)

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the contribution of (a) self-financing and (b) stock market equity finance to the investment requirements of British private industry since 1978.

Mr. Fletcher: It is not possible to relate individual sources of companies' funds to particular uses. Statistics of the sources and uses of United Kingdom industrial and commercial companies' funds are published regularly in "Financial Statistics" table 8.2. On the definitions used in that table, percentage contributions have been as follows:

Percentage of total sources of funds

	Total internal funds	Issues of ordinary shares for cash
1978	78	4
1979	75	3
1980	65	3
1981	64	5
1982	63	3
1983	78	5
January-September
1983	84	6
1984	89	3

Expenditure on fixed assets and on the increase in the book value of stocks in the United Kingdom has accounted for between 57 per cent. and 72 per cent. of total uses of funds in these years. It must be emphasised that different answers could be obtained by classifying certain items differently (for example by treating payments of taxes and dividends as uses of funds instead of deducting them from income as in the table in "Financial Statistics").

Laos

Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the value of British trade with Laos for each of the last five years; and what is the value of British bilateral and multilateral aid to Laos for each of the years since the end of 1975.

Mr. Channon: The value of British trade with Laos for each of the last five years for which complete yearly figures are available is as follows:

£ million

	United Kingdom exports to	United Kingdom imports from
1979	0·3	0·05
1980	0·7	0·03
1981	0·5	0·1
1982	0·9	0·4
1983	0·6	0·1
1984*	0·5	0·2

* January to October.

The value of British bilateral and multilateral aid to Laos since the end of 1975 is as follows:

£ thousand

	Bilateral	Multilateral
1976	100	*100
1977	45	*100
1978	912	*800
1979	29	*600
1980	13	580
1981	80	620
1982	—	520
1983	1	*600

Small Businesses

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish or place in the Library a list showing all schemes and measures currently available to help small businesses, indicating which have been introduced since June 1979 and how each is specifically accessible to worker, neighbourhood and community co-operatives; and how many of each type of co-operative is benefitting from each scheme or measure.

Mr. Trippier: Information on the Government's main schemes is given in the following Department of Trade and Industry publications: "How to make Your Business Grow"; "Help for growing businesses" and "Small firms mean business", copies of which are in the Library. No distinction is normally made in schemes of assistance between co-operatives and other small businesses; they would qualify as long as they satisfied the relevant criteria. For the same reason no separate records are kept of the benefit which co-operatives receive from specific schemes.

Regional Development Grant and Selective Assistance

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing for each year from 1984-85 to 1991-92 the following information, calculated on the same basis as table 4.1 in Cmnd. 9143-II, for regional development grant and selective assistance to individual industries, firms and undertakings (a) the total amounts available, (b) the amount likely to be claimed by all projects which will benefit from the transitional arrangements and (c) the net amount available under the new scheme to new projects.

Mr. Trippier: Projections other than those published in Cmnd. 9143 are not yet available. The White Paper on public expenditure from 1985-86 to 1987-88 is expected to be published very shortly and will give information up to the year 1987-88. Payments under old RDG in respect of expenditure defrayed before 29 November 1984, or of assets provided before 29 November 1985 should be very small by 1988-89 as claims have to be made within two years of the end of the quarter in which the asset is provided. However payments in respect of assets provided as part of certain projects in receipt of selective assistance whose eligibility for the old scheme of regional development grant has been preserved by the transitional provisions may continue until some time after these projects are completed. Payments under the new RDG scheme are expected to increase over the next few years.

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how much Government financial assistance has been given to the tobacco industry in assisted areas in the form of Government grants or otherwise;

(2) if he will list the firms involved where Government financial help in assisted areas has been given to the tobacco industry;

(3) if he will list the Government financial help that has been given to the cigar trade in assisted areas in the last five financial years.

Mr. Trippier: The following selective assistance has been provided by the Department of Trade and Industry under the Industry Act 1972 and Industrial Development Act 1982 to companies in Great Britain from 1 April 1979 to date.

	Payments by value
Section 7
1 April 1979 to 30 November 1984	£5·4 million
Firms receiving assistance
Tabac Leaf Industry Limited
Carreras Rothmans Limited
Imperial Tobacco Limited
J. R. Freeman and Son Limited
Section 8
1 April 1979 to 30 November 1984	£113,000
Firms receiving assistance
W. D. & H. O. Wills Limited
Senior Service Limited

The above assistance was all in grant form.

Information on other assistance by this and other Government Departments is only available at disproportionate cost. No figures are available for the cigar trade in isolation.

British Aerospace

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the Government will provide continuing and increased assistance in promoting British Aerospace overseas in pursuit of orders following the completed privatisation of the company.

Mr. Butcher: There will be no change in the Government assistance available to British Aerospace in relation to overseas sales. British Aerospace will continue to be eligible for the full range of support on the same basis as other United Kingdom companies.

Wine Sales (Code of Practice)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what representations he has received from consumers' organisations concerning the practice by some licensed establishments of selling wine in unlined or unmarked glasses in contravention of the voluntary code of practice agreed between the Government and the licensed trade;

(2) what representations he has received from the local authorities' co-ordinating body on trading standards, concerning the operation of the voluntary code of practice agreed between the Government and the licensed trade on the sale of wine by the glass;

(3) if he will introduce legislation to give statutory effect to provisions of the voluntary code of practice on the sale of wine which require public house licensees to display the price and the precise volume by which wine is sold by the glass.

Mr. Fletcher: Since the introduction of the voluntary code of practice in May 1984 the Department has not received any representations from consumer organisations concerning sales of wine in unmarked glasses.

In October last year the Department received from LACOTS a copy of a survey undertaken by local authorities to ascertain the levels of compliance with the code. This showed that many licensees were unaware of the provisions of the code and that it had not been adopted as widely as had been hoped. However, since the code has been in operation for less than six months, LACOTS decided to conduct a further survey early in 1985. When these results are available we shall be better able to judge the success of the code and decide what further action, if any, is necessary.

Insurance Transactions

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the share of total insurance transactions, including life, property and vehicle insurance but excluding Lloyd's, accounted for by the top five insurance companies in the United Kingdom in 1948, 1958, 1968, 1978 and 1983, or the nearest available year in each case.

Mr. Fletcher: In 1980, the share of net premium income (that is to say net of refunds, rebates and premia for re-insurance ceded for United Kingdom business of all United Kingdom-authorised insurance companies) accounted for by the five United Kingdom-authorised companies with the highest such net premium income, was 23·4 per cent.

1980 was the first year when information in a suitably available form to answer the hon. Member's question was prepared (in "Business Monitor MA16, Insurance Business Statistics 1980"). The figures for subsequent years have not yet been published. Information from other sources could only be collected at disproportionate cost.

Accounting Documents (Statutory Audits)

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will explain more fully the meaning of the words "professional integrity" in article 23 of the EEC eighth directive of 10 April 1984 on approval of persons responsible for carrying out the statutory audits of accounting documents; and whether these words include professional competence.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. W. C. Beckett

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the taking up of a senior position with Lloyd's by Mr. W. C. Beckett, the recently retired solicitor in his Department, was approved by the appropriate departmental committee.

Mr. Butcher: Approval for Mr. Beckett to take up the appointment with Lloyd's was given by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in conformity with the normal rules governing the acceptance of business appointments by Crown servants. Reference to the Advisory Committee (the Diamond committee) was not required under the rules.

Computer Translation (Esperanto)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action the Government are taking on research into computer translation through the use of Esperanto following the study and reports made by the European Economic Community Commission.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

South Africa

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to the number of major United Kingdom investments which have taken place in, and of major contracts which have been concluded with, South Africa in the past 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 18 January 1985; c. 257]: While there is no requirement for United Kingdom companies to report on major contracts which they have concluded overseas, information on the flows of direct investment (excluding banking and oil) by country of investment, is collected annually in the overseas transactions enquiry conducted under the Statistics of Trade Act 1947 by the Department of Trade and Industry. The Bank of England collects corresponding information for banking and oil. Information for 1984 will be published in the spring of 1986. The most recent information is for 1982 (published in "Business Monitor MA4") when net outward direct investment by United Kingdom companies (other than oil) in South Africa was £228 million.

Independent Space Agency

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, prior to the European Space Agency Council meeting in Rome on 30 January, he will make a statement on his policy regarding an independent space agency for Britain.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 21 January 1985, c. 281]: I would see it as more appropriate to consider the need for such an agency in the context of our consideration of the United Kingdom's involvement in the programmes of the European Space Agency over the next 10-15 years and this is a main purpose of the Rome meeting.

PRIME MINISTER

HMS Conqueror

Q36. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the discovery of an unofficial record of the signals received and sent by HMS Conqueror during the Falklands campaign.

The Prime Minister: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to certain turnover notes, though these are not an unofficial signals record. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence told the hon. Gentleman on 14 December, the turnover notes of the radio operator of HMS Conqueror are in the possession of the Ministry of Defence.

Ministerial Cars (Drivers)

Q58. Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister why it is not the practice to give details of the instructions given to drivers of ministerial cars.

The Prime Minister: For reasons of security.

Engagements

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 22 January.

Mr. Dubs asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 22 January.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Construction Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister how many letters she has received concerning the implications for the construction industry of Government restrictions on local government spending; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received two letters on this subject from contractors in the construction industry, and three from other individuals. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment maintains close contact with the construction industry, and discussed reports on infrastucture by NEDO, the CBI and the TUC at the last National Economic Development Council meeting on 9 January 1985. He will be meeting the group of eight next month.

Israel

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister whether she has any plans to seek to pay an official visit to Israel in 1985.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if the Prime Minister of Israel has been invited to pay an official visit to the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: During the visit to Israel last October of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, the Israeli Prime Minister accepted an invitation to make an official visit to Britain. No dates have yet been arranged.

Coal Industry Dispute (Inquiry)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if, in view of the recent decision of the European Assembly to initiate an inquiry into police conduct in the United Kingdom during the miners' dispute, she will make a statement outlining the policy of Her Majesty's Government on whether official co-operation will be given to such inquiries; and if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy not to permit members or officials of the European Assembly to enter the United Kingdom to conduct such inquiries.

The Prime Minister: It is not the policy of the Government to co-operate in inquiries set up the by European Assembly on matters which are outside its competence. No official co-operation will therefore be given to the inquiry into police conduct in the United Kingdom during the miners' dispute. Members and officials of the Assembly seeking to come here in connection with such an inquiry will be treated for immigration purposes in the same way that such members and officials are normally treated.

International Terrorism

Mr. Proctor asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the measures taken against international terrorism by Her Majesty's Government since she addressed the British Jewish community on 21 July 1983 in the areas of closer co-operation between Governments, the sharing of information, plans and techniques by like-minded countries and other relevant matters.

The Prime Minister: In 1984 Her Majesty's Government inspired the agreement among the Ten on measures to improve co-operation against terrorism and the abuse of diplomatic immunity. The Government worked hard to secure the London summit declaration on international terrorism and the resolution adopted by the Ministers of Justice of the Council of Europe. Work continues both multilaterally and in bilateral discussions with individual countries.

Wintex-Cimex '85

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Prime Minister if she will list the Government Departments with offices in Wales which will be taking part in Wintex-Cimex '85.

The Prime Minister: The Welsh Office, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport and HM Customs and Excise have offices in Wales which will be taking part in Wintex-Cimex '85.

Secretary of State for Scotland

Mr. Maxton asked the Prime Minister if she will dismiss the Secretary of State for Scotland.

The Prime Minister: No.

ENERGY

National Coal Board (Security)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he collects any information from the National Coal Board about its use of private security contractors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department does not collect any information of this nature from the National Coal Board.

NCB (Membership)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to change the present membership of the National Coal Board.

Mr. David Hunt: No.

Atomic Energy Authority

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he proposes any further changes to the structure of the Atomic Energy Authority following the review of the rôle and activities of the authority in 1984;

(2) what progress has been made in implementing the recommendation of the recent review of the rôle of the Atomic Energy Authority that the authority should operate on a trading fund basis; if he proposes to introduce legislation to amend the Atomic Energy Authority Act 1954 to enable the authority to borrow in the financial markets; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Good progress has been made in consultations with relevant parties about the recommendations of the AEA review and a statement will be made shortly.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information is available to his Department about the number of National Union of Mineworkers' members who have (a) taken full-time employment elsewhere, (b) died or become permanently incapacitated, (c) reached National Coal Board retirement age and (d) applied for redundancy since the dispute began.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that information is not recorded in the form requested. The available information is as follows:

Men taken off colliery books for reasons stated 12 March 1984 to 5 January 1985:

	Number
Redundancy (all voluntarily accepted)	5,751
Retired for health reasons or deceased	873
Early and age retirement	426

The board has received over 20,000 other inquiries about redundancy benefits. The board also tells me that it has no reliable information about the total number of men who have taken full-time employment elsewhere, but that 2,362 men on colliery books (not included in the figures above) are no longer employed by the board for reasons other than those stated above.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falkland Islands Legislative Council (Constitution)

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the disclosure by the Civil Commissioner, Sir Rex Hunt, of parts of the new constitution to the Falkland Islands Legislative Council in advance of its publication to the House in March was done with his prior consent.

Mr. Renton: Ministers agreed last December that the latest draft of the constitution should be made available by the Civil Commissioner to councillors for their consideration. It was entirely in accordance with normal practice that councillors should be consulted in this way.

Gas Pipeline Contracts (Libya)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps through diplomatic sources in Libya to seek to establish the extent of involvement of United Kingdom companies or their subsidiaries in gas pipeline contracts in that country.

Mr. Channon: I have been asked to reply.

Since the break in diplomatic relations with Libya on 29 April 1984, the Italian Government have been responsible for the protection of British interests in Libya. Two junior diplomats are attached to the Italian embassy in Tripoli to help with consular and administrative affairs, but not commercial matters. Therefore I am unable to take the steps suggested.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Free Transport

15. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to change the rules concerning free transport to schools.

Mr. Dunn: There are no plans at present to amend the provisions on school transport in the Education Act 1944. We shall continue to watch the situation.

Young Persons (Study)

16. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of young people studying under the 21 and 15 hour rules.

Sir Keith Joseph: Records are not kept centrally but there are indications that the number has increased since the Youthaid organisation estimated a figure of about 10,000 in 1982/83.

Further Education (Lecturers)

17. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next expects to discuss pay and conditions with the unions representing lecturers in further education; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have discussions with the main unions representing teachers from time to time. However, since the pay of further education lecturers is a matter for the Burnham further education committee, and conditions of service for the national joint council for teachers in further education, these are not normally on the agenda for such discussions. I have no immediate plans for a meeting with the associations representing further education teachers.

Student Unions

18. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has had concerning compulsory membership of student unions.

Mr. Brooke: Eight representations have been received since January 1984, in most cases from right hon. and hon. Members referring to correspondence they had themselves received.

31. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to calculate the total amount of public funds spent on the financing of university and college student unions.

Mr. Brooke: The information is not available. Its collation would involve making inquiries of a large number of institutions and my right hon. Friend does not believe this to be justified. The best information available is that in the academic year 1982-83, United Kingdom universities and polytechnics in England and Wales allocated some £21·4 million to their student unions.

Open University

21. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with the Open University about its level of funding for the next three years.

Mr. Brooke: On 3 December 1984 my right hon. Friend met representatives of the Open University's Council, including the chairman of the council and the vice-chancellor of the university.

Grammar Schools

23. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those local authorities who retain selection at 11-plus and indicate the percentage of children in each authority who go to grammar schools and, when the grammar schools are single sex, the percentage of boys or girls admitted.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is given in the following table:

LEAs with Grammar Schools in January 1984

Scottish Universities (Student Numbers)

24. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the principals of Scottish universities to discuss student numbers.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend last met the Scottish university principals on 15 January 1982 informally at their invitation to discuss relevant higher education issues. I attended a similar occasion in February last year.

Educational Maintenance Allowance

25. Mrs Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will introduce educational maintenance allowances for 16 and 17-year-olds.

Sir Keith Joseph: Local education authorities already have powers to pay education maintenance allowances at their discretion. I have no plans at present to change the arrangements.

Truancy

20. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils were absent from school on other than legitimate ground on the last convenient date for which information was available in England and Wales.

Mr. Dunn: There has been no recent survey of truancy rates but research and local surveys suggest that on any school day between 2 and 4 per cent. of secondary pupils in England are likely to be absent from school without good reason. Information for Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Youth Training Scheme

19. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will next meet the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission to discuss the youth training scheme.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have no immediate plan to do so.

33. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will next meet the Confederation of British Industry and Trades Union Congress to discuss the youth training scheme.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have no immediate plans to do so but I am always ready to hear their views on the role of the education system in the YTS and on education and training generally.

Teachers (Pay)

26. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has for restarting the salary structure talks in relation to the teaching profession.

Sir Keith Joseph: The salary structure talks took place under the auspices of the Burnham primary and secondary committee and they can resume only with the agreement of a majority on both sides of the committee. There seems little prospect of such agreement in the immediate future, and I am therefore considering what other possibilities are open to me to pursue my objectives for better teacher management and quality.

Education Act 1981

22. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with local education authorities about the number of children who have been the subject of a statement under the Education Act 1981 and for whom there are not suitable places in schools or special schools to implement the statement.

Mr. Dunn: None. Although there may be difficulties or delays in finding suitable places for individual children, there does not seem to be any general problem which would justify intervention by my right hon. Friend. If a child is awaiting a vacancy, the local education authority will normally make temporary arrangements, including home tuition if appropriate.

Heriot Watt University (Pharmacy Department)

27. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the results of recent consultations between his Department and Heriot Watt university regarding the proposal to close the pharmacy department at Heriot Watt.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend understands that the University Grants Committee has given careful consideration to the points put forward by the university and the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain at a meeting held last month, but has concluded that no new arguments were put forward that would justify their altering their previous decision.

Privatisation

28. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are the current estimated savings by his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Department is not involved in privatisation schemes in the sense of transferring the whole of a central Government undertaking to the private sector. It does however contract out the provision of its own common services where this in the interests of efficient management, but it is not possible to estimate the total savings accruing.

Corporal Punishment

29. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the Government intend to publish their Bill relating to corporal punishment in schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Bill received its First Reading on 11 January 1985 and was published on that day.

Alpha Research Projects

30. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement giving conveniently approximate figures as to how many alpha research projects were rejected in 1984 by (a) the Science and Engineering Research Council and (b) the Medical Research Council.

Mr. Brooke: The number of applications graded alpha but rejected by SERC's boards in the academic year 1983-84 was:

	number
Science	324
Engineering (less Biotechnology Directorate)	129
Astronomy, Space and Radio	44
TOTAL	497

The Nuclear Physics Board and the Biotechnology Directorate of the Engineering Board do not grade applications as the majority of their grants expenditure supports rolling programmes of which grants form integral parts. Numbers of rejections considered to be of alpha quality therefore cannot be given in respect of these parts of SERC.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 14 November 1984 at column 238 about MRC projects.

LEA (Finances)

32. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next expects to meet the leader of the Inner London education authority to discuss the finances of that authority.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have no present plans to meet Mrs. Morrell. I am always willing to do so should she request it.

Further Education

34. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils remained in schools or other full-time education beyond the school leaving age in September 1984; and what was the age participation rate for 16 and 17-year-olds remaining in full-time education in September 1984.

Sir Keith Joseph: It is estimated that there were 390 thousand pupils above the minimum school leaving age in maintained and independent schools (but excluding special schools) in England at September 1984. As proportions of the appropriate age groups it is estimated that 30·8 per cent. of 16-year-olds and 18·3 per cent. of 17-year-olds were in maintained and independent schools at that date. Information about the numbers of young people in full time further education other than school is not yet available.

Teaching Profession (Restructuring)

35. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any representations from the teachers' unions regarding the restructuring of the teaching profession.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel).

Further Education (Low-income Families)

36. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to encourage the children of people on low incomes to continue education beyond 16 years of age.

Sir Keith Joseph: The first requirement, which is relevant for all young people, is that the curriculum provided by schools and colleges is relevant to their needs and the needs of employers: the Government have taken a number of important initiatives in this area. As for financial support, the Government are considering the recommendations of the team which has been reviewing social security benefits for children and young people. Child benefit is paid to the parents of children who remain in full-time education up to the age of 19, and local education authorities have discretionary powers to pay education maintenance allowances and other grants.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

37. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on trends in pupil-teacher ratios in primary and secondary schools in England, respectively, since January 1984.

Mr. Dunn: Pupil-teacher ratios in maintained primary and secondary schools in England in January 1984 were 22·1 and 16·2 respectively. Corresponding figures for January 1985 are not yet available

Student Loans

38. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the findings of the departmental review of the case for and against student loans carried out by his Department during the last two years.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to my answer given earlier today to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

Comprehensive Schools

39. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the educational achievement of comprehensive schools.

Mr. Dunn: The objective of Government policy is to raise the standards of achievement by pupils in all types of school.

16 to 18-year-olds

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of 16 to 18-year-olds in the United Kingdom are in education or training; and what are the comparable figures for France, West Germany and Japan.

Sir Keith Joseph: The information requested is as follows:

Participation in education and training (full-time and part-time) of 16 to 18-year-olds*

	Year	Minimum leaving age	Percentage of 16 to 18 year olds in education and training
France	1981	16	66
Japan†	1981	15	73
West Germany‡	1981	15	85
United Kingdom (including YTS)	1983	16	65

* Including apprenticeships, YTS and similar schemes.
† Estimated; excluding some 18-year-olds in certain vocational training.

‡ Including 3 years compulsory part-time education for 15 year old leavers.

‖ Including some double counting due to evening classes (under 5 per cent.) but excluding private sector full-time further education. Includes employer-based part-time day study outside of FE colleges.

Teachers (Training)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the case for expanding teacher training from 1986 onwards; and what response he has made.

Mr. Dunn: The advisory committee on the supply and education of teachers have recently submitted advice on future intakes to initial teacher training which recommends increases of some 49 per cent. and 9 per cent. in admissions to initial training courses for primary teachers and secondary teachers respectively in the period between 1986 and 1989. This advice is currently under consideration by my right hon. Friend, with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. Decisions on the level of intakes to initial teacher training for 1986 and beyond will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has made of the output of teacher training institutions between 1986 and 1990 as compared with the anticipated needs of (a) primary and (b) secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: If intakes to initial teacher training in England and Wales were to continue at the level planned for 1985, it is forecast that the effective output of newly-trained primary teachers in 1986 and 1990 would be some 5,200 and 6,100 respectively. The corresponding estimates for secondary teachers are 7,000 and 6,800 respectively. Estimates of the future staffing needs of schools depend on a number of factors, including forecasts of pupil numbers, the ratio of pupils to teachers and assumptions made about the deployment of the teacher force. Recent advice from the advisory committee on the supply and education of teachers suggests that the demand for new entrant primary teachers will be higher than the forecast output for the coming years if staffing is to be provided at a level which the committee judges necessary for the effective support of the Government's education policies. The demand for new entrant secondary teachers is estimated by the committee at below the forecast output for 1986 but at about the same level for 1990. My right hon. Friend, with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, will take this advice into account in determining the level of intakes to initial teacher training for 1986 and beyond.

"Action on Education"

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has now read the report "Action on Education" by the British Institute of Management, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what is his response.

Mr. Dunn: Copies of the report have been sent to Ministers by the British Institute of Management; representatives of the Institute are to discuss it with senior officials of the Department shortly.

"Parental Influence at School"

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received regarding the Green Paper "Parental Influence at School", Cmnd. 9242; if he will give a breakdown of this figure; and if he will indicate how many urged student representation on school governing bodies.

Mr. Dunn: Responses to the Green Paper have been received from 730 individuals and organisations, as follows:

	Responses
Main national bodies	30
Main religious and voluntary bodies	29
LEAs and groups of LEAs	77
Governing bodies and groups of governors	221
Parent/teacher associations and parent groups	51
School teaching staffs and teacher/union groups	41
Individuals and other groups	281
Total	730

The Green Paper did not propose that there should be pupil governors and very few respondents suggested this.

Student Grants

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning student grants.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 18 January 1985 to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) at column 240.

Council for Overseas Student Affairs

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to assist the United Kingdom Council for Overseas Student Affairs.

Mr. Brooke: The United Kingdom council for overseas student affairs provides advice and information to overseas students in this country and to the institutions of further and higher education they attend, and promotes the study of questions affecting the education of overseas students. In recognition of the benefits of the council's work to overseas students and to further and higher education, and in response to an approach from the council, my right hon. Friend has decided, subject to parliamentary approval and to the availability of resources, to make the council an annual grant to provide a regular source of Government support instead of the intermittent and ad hoc grants that have previously been offered. The council will nevertheless continue to have to rely for the major part of its funding on its members and on the generosity of private and corporate donors, as is appropriate for a voluntary organisation of this nature.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the Estimates in due course, my right hon. Friend proposes that the grant to the council for 1985-86 should be £72,000.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what change he expects in real terms in expenditure on education and science between 1984-85 and 1985-86; how this compares with changes in the school population; and how both real terms expenditure and pupil numbers have moved between 1979-80 and 1984-85.

Sir Keith Joseph: Table 1.7 of the public expenditure White Paper, Cmnd. 9428, published today, shows in real terms as measured by the GDP deflator, a reduction in expenditure on education and science of around 5 per cent. between 1984-85 and 1985-86. This reduction makes no allowance for the abolition of the NI surcharge for local authorities from April 1985, and the transfer of some funds to the MSC in 1985-86. In addition, the figure for 1985-86 includes no part of the £595 million for local authority current expenditure not allocated to programmes, some of which, as in 1984-85, will no doubt be spent on education. When allowance is made for these factors, it is likely that the reduction will be below 4·5 per cent. The school population is projected to fall by nearly 2 per cent. between this year and next. Between 1979-80 and 1984-85, expenditure on education and science increased by about 1 per cent. in real terms, compared with a fall of over 12 per cent. in the school population.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Schemes (Waltham Forest)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all the individual managing agents and sponsors who run youth training schemes in Waltham Forest; and how many trainees they each have under their control.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The names of managing agents and sponsors operating in the London borough of Waltham Forest, including those organised on a national basis, and details of numbers of youngsters in training at 17 January 1985 are as follows:

Number of Trainees (includes both 1983-84 and 1984-85 entrants)

	Number
1. Locally negotiated schemes
Waltham Forest Chamber of Commerce	199
London Borough of Waltham Forest Community Education Department

Construction Industry

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers were employed in the construction industry in (a) west Yorkshire, (b) the Huddersfield travel-to-work area and (c) Yorkshire and Humberside in 1979 and for the latest date available.

Mr. Alan Clark: No census of employment was taken in 1979. Following is the information at June 1978 and September 1981, the latest date for which information is available. As results of the 1978 census are not available for the new travel-to-work areas announced last year, information is given for the Huddersfield travel-to-work area as defined before last year's review.

Employees in Employment: Construction Industry	June 1978	September 1981
West Yorkshire	42,257	39,056
Huddersfield travel-to-work area	3,264	2,884
Yorkshire and Humberside	111,073	99,466

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers were employed in the construction industry in (a) the Liverpool travel-to-work area and (b) the Merseyside special development area in June 1979 and at the latest available date, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: No census of employment was taken in 1979. The June 1978 census shows 19,339 employees in employment in the construction industry in the Liverpool travel-to-work area, as defined before last year's review of travel-to-work areas, and 34,092 in the Merseyside special development area. At September 1981, the latest date for which information is available, the corresponding figures were 17,497 and 31,019 respectively. Results of the 1978 census are not available for the revised Liverpool travel-to-work area announced last year.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many workers were employed in the construction industry in England and Wales in June 1979; and what were the figures at the latest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The estimated numbers of employees in employment in the construction industry in England and Wales in June 1979 and September 1984, the latest available date, were as follows:

	England	Wales
June 1979	997,000	61,800
September 1984	818,000	46,900

Job Creation

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the figures for (a) the number of new jobs created and (b) the number of school leavers entering the job market for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of the number of new jobs created, which can be defined in differing ways, are not available. Estimated numbers of school leavers in Great Britain available for employment in the years requested are shown in the following table.

Academic year ending 31 August	Estimated numbers of school-leavers available for employment (thousands)*
1975	630
1976	640
1977	670

1983	650
1984†	630

* All leavers less those expected to enter either full-time further education or temporary employment pending entry to full-time further education.
† Estimate subject to revision.

National Service Act 1948

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Employment, for each of the last 10 years, how many cases have been determined by reinstatement committees established under the provisions of the National Service Act 1948.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None. The last of these committees ceased to exist at the end of 1976. There has subsequently been no need to reconstitute them.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia (Famine Relief)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has obtained from Her Majesty's ambassadors in the following countries or from the United Nations Organisation, about the monetary value or extent of emergency famine relief given to Ethiopia by (a) Saudi Arabia, (b) Kuwait, (c) the United Arab Emirates, (d) Syria, (e) Libya, (f) Iraq and (g) Iran.

Mr. Raison: Most of these countries have given help to several African countries in need, but it has not been possible to obtain a detailed breakdown showing famine relief given specifically to Ethiopia.

SCOTLAND

School Leavers

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish for each Manpower Services Commission area office in the Scottish region and for (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds, the latest careers service estimates of the number and proportion expected to leave school and further education college, and the number and proportion expected to find work outside the youth training scheme by 31 December.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested on school leavers is as follows. It is derived from provisional forecasts of the position in December 1985 made by principal careers officers in the autumn of 1984 and must therefore be regarded as tentative. Principal careers officers have been asked to provide revised forecasts later this month in the light of the better information which is now available to them. There is insufficient information on which to base estimates of leavers from colleges of further education in each area.

Home Insulation Grants

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what increase has been made in the provision for home insulation grants in Scotland contained in the total local authority housing capital allocations for 1985-86, to take account of the first full year of the operation of the topping-up grants for loft insulation under the homes insulation grant scheme.

Mr. Ancram: The allocation of resources for homes insulation grants is made separately from local authority housing capital allocations. The allocation has not yet been made for 1985-86, but £0·7 million has been included in the total amount available for distribution to local authorities in order to meet additional demands for grant for topping-up existing loft insulation.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many families were on waiting lists for public housing in Scotland at the latest available date.

Mr. Ancram: As I explained to the hon. Member for Maryhill in my reply of 12 March 1984, authoritative information of the kind requested is not available centrally.

Construction Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he proposes to reduce unemployment in the construction industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The key to producing worthwhile long-term increases in the level of employment in the construction industry is the continuation of the Government's efforts to achieve a healthy and stable economy by controlling public expenditure and public borrowing, thereby maintaining a low rate of inflation, improving the climate for investment and stimulating industrial recovery.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many workers were unemployed in the construction industry in Scotland in June 1979 and at the latest available date, respectively.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is not available for June 1979 as the industrial analysis of the unemployed was compiled quarterly in February, May, August and November. This analysis was discontinued in May 1982.

The number of unemployed registrants in Scotland whose last employment was in the construction industry was respectively 23,667 and 46,521 in May 1979 and May 1982.

Children (Convictions)

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if will list in the Official Report the number of children convicted on indictment who were released on licence under section 206 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 in each of the years 1978 to 1984.

Mr. Ancram: The number of persons, sentenced as children and released on licence under section 206(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1967, as amended by section 44 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980, before the end of their sentences, was:

	Number
1978	34
1979	18
1980	18
1981	5
1982	15
1983	18
1984	8

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of children given custodial sentences following conviction on indictment for each of the years 1976 to 1984.

Mr. Ancram: The numbers of children given custodial sentences following conviction on indictment in the years 1976 to 1983 are give in the following table. Information for 1984 is not yet available.

Custodial sentences imposed on children in Scotland

	Number
1976	33
1977	38
1978	18
1979	21
1980	7
1981	9
1982	13
1983	13

Spina Bifida

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of infants born with spina bifida in Scotland in each of the years 1978 to 1984.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	Live births	Stillbirths	Total
1978	121	15	136
1979	81	10	91
1980	63	12	75
1981	67	6	73
1982	67	8	75
*1983	—	—	—
*1984	—	—	—

* Not yet available.

Parole Assessments

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total number of parole assessments made by each of the local review committees in each of the years 1978 to 1984.

Mr. Ancram: The information is not readily available in the form requested.

Local Review Committees

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of local review committees, their location at penal institutions, the composition and size of their membership and the criteria by which members of the public are selected for membership.

Mr. Ancram: The location and composition of the 12 local review committees is as follows:

Location	The Governor	Social workers	*Independent members
Aberdeen	1	3	3
Castle Huntly (same membership as Noranside)	1	3	3
Cornton Vale	1	3	3
Dumfries	1	3	3
Dungavel (covering also Barlinnie Special Unit cases)	1	3	3
Edinburgh	1	5	5
Glenochil	1	3	5
Noranside (same membership as Castle Huntly)	1	3	3
Penninghame	1	3	3
Perth	1	3	4
Peterhead (covering also Inverness Prison cases)	1	3	3
Shotts (covering also Barlinnie Prison cases)	1	3	3

* Persons who do not fall into either of the other categories and are not prison officers.

Independent members are selected for membership of local review committees on their individual merits, but with particular regard to their interests in social or penal affairs and their ability to contribute effectively to the preparatory work and meetings of local review committees.

NHS (Employment Statistics)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will give a breakdown as to how many new doctors, nurses and auxiliary staff have been employed by the National Health Service in Scotland since May 1979, giving separate figures for each region, year by year, to date, indicating the net increase and number for each category since May 1979.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Greater Glasgow local dental committee concerning the proposed restrictions on the number of drugs prescribable for patients on National Health Service form GP14 as from 1 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: None direct, but I have been asked by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) to comment on representations about the new measures which he has received from the Greater Glasgow local dental committee.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Nurses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many student nurses have recently completed their training at each of the teaching hospitals in Northern Ireland; how many have been offered nurse posts at each of these hospitals; and how many have been offered nurse posts elsewhere in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chris Patten: This information is not readily available in the form requested. The numbers of nurses at each of the seven colleges of nursing in Northern Ireland who were successful in the examination results published on the 3 October 1984 are as follows:

Newly Qualified Nurses

	Nurses who qualified at last outturn	Nurses who obtained posts at hospitals at which they trained
Belfast Northern College	70	†
Belfast Southern College	48	26
North Down College	25	†
Northern Area College	12	10
Southern Area College	31	19
Western Area College	34	20
College of Mental Health	23	*9

* This does not include nurses who may have obtained posts with the Eastern Health and Social Services Board.

† Not readily available.

Information on the number of those newly qualified nurses who obtained nurse posts elsewhere in Northern Ireland is not available.

Hotel Bedrooms (Grants)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new hotel bedrooms were approved for grant support in Northern Ireland in each of the three years ended 31 December 1982, 1983 and 1984.

Dr. Boyson: The information is as follows:

Year end 31 December	1982	1983	1984
Number of new hotel bedrooms approved for grant	35	84	170

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many families were on the waiting list for public housing in the Province at the latest date.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Construction Industry

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures he proposes to reduce unemployment in the construction industry in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Government recognise the importance of the construction industry to the Northern Ireland economy. This was borne in mind when deciding Northern Ireland's public expenditure allocations for 1985-86, which were announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on 12 December 1984, at column 499. Full details have yet to be worked out, but I would expect planned capital expenditure next year to exceed £600 million, representing a real increase over this year's final figure.

This level of public expenditure should help to reduce still further unemployment in the construction industry, which has fallen by almost 1,000 as compared with this time last year.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many workers were employed in the construction industry in the Province in June 1979 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Chris Patten: There were 37,150 employees in employment in the construction industry in Northern Ireland at June 1979. The corresponding figure at September 1984 (the latest available information) was 23,970 (provisional). Figures for Northern Ireland employment on a quarterly basis are available in the Library.

Housing Executive (Tenancies)

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons with addresses in the Irish Republic have been granted the tenancy of Housing Executive dwellings in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years.

Mr. Chris Patten: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Store Cattle (Exports)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many store cattle were exported from Northern Ireland to other regions of the United Kingdom in each of the last three years.

Dr. Boyson [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 282]: The information is as follows:

	Number
1982	8,816
1983	1,711
1984	2,057

Game Licences

Mr. William Ross asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many game licences were issued in Northern Ireland in each of the last five yars; and for each year, or financial year if more convenient, how many were for (a) a full year, (b) the period 1 August to 31 October and (c) 1 November to 31 July.

Mr. Chris Patten: The available information is as follows:

Game Licensing Year

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85*
Full year licences issued between 1 August and 31 October and due to expire on the following 31 July	1,425	1,587	1,726	1,774

Remainder of the year ie issued on or after 3 November and due to expire on the following 31 July	180	176	191	212
Licences covering a continuous period of not more than fourteen days	48	60	49	41
Total number of licences issued	1,663	1,841	1,973	2,061

* Up to 17 January 1985.

WALES

Lampeter and Cardigan (Congestion)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will expedite the start of a roundabout traffic arrangement to relieve congestion at the junction of the main roads from Lampeter and Cardigan with the A40 trunk road immediately east of the town of Carmarthen.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Preparation of a scheme is proceeding as quickly as possible, but a start of works will depend on the completion of statutory procedures and the availability of funds.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales of how many instances he is aware of milk quotas being transferred from one farm to another in Wales, and the volume of milk production involved in these transfers; how many of these involved transfers across county boundaries; and whether any were transfers to farms outside Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is not readily available and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the approximate average length of time which appellants have to wait, after appearing before milk quota tribunals in Wales, before a decision on the outcome of the hearing is notified to them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Appellants appearing before the Dairy Products Quota Tribunal in Wales are being informed of the tribunal's decision within four to five weeks at present. Every effort is being made to reduce this period as the work of the tribunal draws to a close.

Grants and Assistance (Departmental Staff)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the increase he expects in the number of staff at his Department processing both regional development grants and selective financial assistance following recent announcements in Government regional policy.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Initially, 81 posts including support staff; of which 72·5 have been transferred from the Department of Trade and Industry.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate by county, the extra costs incurred in Wales by authorities discharging their statutory obligations under the Child Care Act 1980 and the Provision of Milk and Meals Regulations 1969 during the course of the current dispute in the mining industry.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No. Information is not available centrally. Furthermore, the Provisions of Milk and Meals Regulations 1969 were repealed by the Education Act 1980.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the extra costs incurred by district councils in Wales in pursuance of their obligations under the Social Security and Housing Benefits Acts 1982 as a result of the current dispute in the mining industry.

Mr. Newton: I have been asked to reply.

The information is not available.

Local authorities in claiming subsidies from this Department for their housing benefit costs are not required to estimate how much benefit will be received by strikers and their families.

The information is not therefore available now and will not become so even when subsidy claims for the period covered by the miners strike have been finalised.

TRANSPORT

Vehicle Testing

16. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport, for 1983-84 in Wales, by operator group, what was the number of vehicles that failed the annual public service vehicle test.

Mrs. Chalker: As initially presented for test the failure rates are about 35 per cent. for public sector vehicles and about 49 per cent. for private sector vehicles. Vehicles may fail the tests for reasons not connected with road safety. Failure rates at the test do not therefore necessarily indicate the mechanical condition of vehicles in service.

The number of vehicles which failed the test at the first attempt is as follows:

Wales 1983-84

Operator	Total Number of Tests	Number of Failures	Per cent.
NCB	1,368	469	34
Local Authority	518	195	38
Private	2,894	1,423	49

These results take no account of vehicles which passed after minor repairs were carried out at the testing stations. Taking those vehicles into account the number failed were as follows:

Operator	Number of Failures	Per cent.
NCB	132	10
Local Authority	56	11
Private	938	32

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the reply by his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, 14 January, Official Report, column 49, if he will give the figures for the pass rate in the passenger service vehicle test which incorporate passes obtained after immediate rectification of faults; if he will explain the term "following immediate rectification of faults"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Where a vehicle presented for test fails for minor defects the examiner may allow the operator to rectify the defects on the spot and present the vehicle again forthwith when it can be given a "pass after rectification".

Larger operators are generally better placed to take advantage of this system for their vehicles are more often tested on their own premises. The initial pass rate for private operators compares favourably with the pass rate for other operators and is about average for the whole PSV fleet. The figures are as follows:

Great Britain 1983-84

Operator	Number of Vehicles Tested	Initial Pass Rate Number	Pass Rate	Additional Passes After Rectification of Minor Faults
			Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
NBC	14,173	8,509	60	3,973	28

Local Authority	5,168	3,481	67	1,201	23
Private	28,634	16,040	56	3,828	13
London Transport	4,965	2,340	47	2,063	42
Scottish Bus Group	3,105	2,077	67	351	11
Total	65,292	37,020	57	14,327	22

Woolwich Ferry

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are his current proposals for the future ownership and operation of the Woolwich ferry after the abolition of the Greater London council.

Mrs. Chalker: Appropriate arrangements to ensure the continued free operation of the ferry will be made in the light of our consultations.

Cycling

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that the cycling project team is retained; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no plans to disband my team working on cycling matters.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many cycle schemes have been implemented (a) nationally and (b) throughout London in the last three years.

Mrs. Chalker: This information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the figure for the total amount spent by his Department for (a) cycle schemes and (b) cycle safety campaigns in 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: In the 12 months to 31 December 1984 £178,195 was spent on innovative cycle schemes and schemes in the cycle route programme by the Department. The national pedal cycle safety publicity campaign cost £1,156,342. These figures do not include staff or administration costs at the Department of Transport headquarters and at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory, or expenditure accepted for TSG.

Greater Manchester (Abnormal Loads)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many abnormal loads pass through Greater Manchester per year; and what provision for abnormal load routeing he has made for the financial year 1986-87.

Mrs. Chalker: On average about 9,500 abnormal loads pass through the Greater Manchester area each year. We are at present considering what provision should be made for abnormal load routeing in 1986-87. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman when we have reached a decision.

Greater Manchester (Trunk Road Bridges)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made for the maintenance of trunk road bridges in Greater Manchester in the financial year 1986-87.

Mrs. Chalker: We have not finalised future arrangements for the maintenance of trunk road bridges in the Greater Manchester area. At present, we are consulting the district councils in the area and will decide the best way forward when we have their views.

Kirkhamgate-Dishforth Road Scheme

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make a statement on the Kirkhamgate-Dishforth road scheme.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment hope to announce a decision in the early part of 1985.

Railway Employees (Accident Statistics)

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of railway employees killed and seriously injured in accidents whilst on duty in each of the past 10 years and show how many of those killed and injured were struck by trains.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information requested is as follows:

Fatal and Serious Accidents to Railway Employees on all Railways in Great Britain

Year	All accidents			Struck by trains
	Fatal	Serious	Total	Fatal	Serious	Total
1975	46	595	641	27	104	131
1976	46	559	605	30	70	100
1977	34	629	663	28	101	129
1978	45	781	826	33	88	121
1979	43	807	850	24	81	105
1980	32	611	643	20	94	114
1981	27	192	219	21	35	56
1982	27	137	164	17	22	39
1983	28	161	189	24	39	63
1984*	25	120	145	14	18	32

* Provisional.

Note: In 1981 the definition of a serious injury was changed to conform to the more rigorous "major injury" classification used by the Health and Safety Executive.

The figures show a significant decrease in the number of industrial deaths and serious injuries, the 1984 figures being the lowest ever recorded. The improvement reflects the considerable effort put into accident prevention in recent years within the railway industry.

Bus Service (Cross Subsidy)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East of 14 January, whether he will now estimate the current value of cross subsidy in the bus service.

Mr. David Mitchell: Appendix B of the White Paper "Buses" (Cmnd. 9300), discussed the available information on cross subsidy in the bus industry. Subsequently the National Bus Company has suggested that the level of cross subsidy which it might withdraw on deregulation was £122 million, or twice the amount of direct revenue subsidy. The amount of cross subsidy at risk in passenger transport areas is likely to be relatively smaller, because of the higher incidence of direct subsidy. No specific estimate is available for cross subsidy by municipal undertakings or the private sector which might be withdrawn following deregulation.

British Airways

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to float shares in British Airways; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have nothing to add to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, to my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on Thursday, 17 January at column 193.

Motor Cyclists (Driving Tests)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations alleging inadequacy in the one-part test for motor cyclists with sidecars he has received; and what action he is taking in response thereto.

Mrs. Chalker: I have received no such representations, but if my hon. Friend would like to write to me about any particular matter of concern, I shall be pleased to consider it.

Electrically Assisted Pedal Cycles

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East of 17 January, if he will introduce legislation (a) to require drivers of electrically assisted pedal cycles to pass a driving test, hold a current driving licence and possess a valid motor insurance certificate, (b) to render the owners of such vehicles liable to vehicle excise duty and (c) to require such vehicles to be submitted to a periodic roadworthiness test; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Legislation has only recently provided for electrically assisted pedal cycles to be treated as pedal cycles not as motor vehicles. This excludes them from requirements relating to driver testing and licensing, compulsory motor insurance and tests of roadworthiness. All electric vehicles are exempt from vehicle excise duty. I have no grounds for seeking a reversal of Parliament's decision.

Air Traffic Licences

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what effect the slippage in plans for privatising British Airways will have on the manner in which he exercises his functions in relation to appeals against Civil Aviation Authority decisions on air traffic licences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There will be no effect since the privatisation of British Airways has never been material to my right hon. Friend's consideration of appeals.

Airport Security

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many persons are employed in airport security in the United Kingdom; what was the cost in the last convenient year; and how the cost is met.

Mr. Michael Spicer: When on 29 July 1982 the Secretary of State for Trade announced that the aviation security fund was to be wound up it was stated that, as from April 1983, the costs of security would in general be met directly by the airport authorities who would then recover them from the airlines; the Department of Trade would continue to set and monitor security standards. Folliwing the winding up of the fund, the Department of Trade and, since June 1983, the Department of Transport have continued to set security standards and to monitor the implementation of those standards by the security staff employed by United Kingdom airports and by the security staff employed by United Kingdom and foreign airlines at United Kingdom airports. The total number of security staff involved and the costs involved are entirely matters for the airports and airlines concerned and in most cases now security costs may not be distinquishable from other operating costs.

MOT Scheme

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received concerning his Department's proposed new test station regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: Representations have been received from motoring organisations and the motor trade whose views were sought as part of the consultation exercise on the proposed new conditions of appointment to the MOT scheme. These organisations are:

Motor Agents Association;
Scottish Motor Trade Association;
Motor Cycle Association of Great Britain;
Motor Cycle Retailers Association;
Garage Equipment Association;
Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders;
Royal Automobile Club;
Automobile Association;
Vehicle Builders and Repairers Association;
Association of District Councils;
Association of Metropolitan Authorities;
Association of County Councils; and British Telecom.

In addition to representations from these bodies, 37 letters have been received from garages and members of the public. A number of these were made following an article in Motor Trader. Thirty-five hon. Members have also written to me about the proposals.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether, in view of the deferment on the introduction of his Department's proposed new test station regulations, he will consider lifting the embargo on the appointment of new testing centres;

(2) when he expects his Department's proposed new test station regulations to be introduced.

Mrs. Chalker: No specific date has been set for the introduction of new conditions for authorised examiners and there has consequently been no deferment. It remains my intention to make an announcement as soon as consultations with interested bodies are concluded, and agreement on the final form of the conditions is reached. Their introduction will be accompanied by a lifting of the present embargo on new applications for appointment to the MOT scheme. I do not intend to lift the embargo until then.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he had with the motor trade when drawing up the proposed new regulations for Ministry of Transport test stations.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department has regular contacts with representatives of the motor trade. The main organisations have been consulted about the new proposals, and my officials held meetings with the trade in autumn 1984. I met the Motor Agents Association for further discussions on 18 December.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many copies of the proposed new regulations on MOT test stations were available for distribution from local Ministry of Transport offices at the time of announcement; and if he is satisfied that the local Ministry of Transport offices were fully conversant with the details of the scheme.

Mrs. Chalker: consultations with the motoring organisations and the motor trade are still taking place and no announcement about new conditions of appointment has yet been made. Copies of the final form of the new conditions are not therefore available. The Department's local offices will be sent copies for distribution as necessary as soon as the proposals are finalised.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by car model the number of vehicles that require the services of a jacking bridge of 1·5 tonnes capacity as laid down in the proposed new Ministry of Transport test station regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: The majority of cars, with the exception of heavy vehicles such as the Rolls-Royce, do not require a jacking bridge of 1·5 tonnes capacity. However, the MOT test also covers light goods vehicles, ambulances, mobile homes and vans up to 1,525 kg unladen weight, for which all testing stations are required to make provision. A number of these vehicles will be laden at the time of test. It is in recognition of the safety hazard when lifting these vehicles, which now has to be done using supplementary jacks, that jacking bridge capacity has been increased to 1·5 tonnes.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has received that stipulates a requirement to increase the depth of an inspection pit in a Ministry of Transport test station from 54 in to 60 in as proposed in the new Ministry of Transport test station regulations.

Mrs. Chalker: An increase in the depth of inspection pits from 54 in to 60 in will be conducive to a better examination in view of the difficulty that testers are known to have when inspecting vehicles with low ground clearance, including most cars. I propose that new entrants to the vehicle testing scheme will therefore be required to provide inspection pits with a minimum depth of 60 in. While this will also apply to changes of ownership of a testing station after one year, in the light of representations I have received about the difficulties of altering pits, I am not proposing to ask existing authorised examiners to meet this new requirement.

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, in view of the extra facilities required for Ministry of Transport test stations, he intends to introduce new testing fees.

Mrs. Chalker: The maximum fee chargeable for the MOT test is reviewed annually in consultation with representations of the motor trade. Another review will take place later this year.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects the public inquiry into the proposed east London river crossing to be held.

Mrs. Chalker: As I told the hon. Member on 24 October, I expect the public inquiry to start this summer. I aim to announce the actual start date during the spring.

Weighbridges

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) by what date he expects driver self-weigh facilities to be installed on the Department's axle weighbridges at ports;

(2) by what date he expects axle weighbridges to be installed at those ports which do not yet have those facilities; and whether he is satisfied that sufficient funds have been made available in the coming financial year to ensure that this work can be carried out by the dates given.

Mrs. Chalker: Driver self-weigh equipment has been provided at the ports of Plymouth, Poole, Dover East and Dover West. Consideration is being given to providing a self-weigh facility during 1985 at other RO/RO ports with axle weighbridges where security of the equipment can be maintained.

I am satisfied that the financial allocations for 1985-86 will allow self-weigh equipment to be installed at these ports and is sufficient to cover the installation of weighbridges at those RO/EO ports which are to be provided with them.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving (a) a list of those of his Department's weighbridges which are open for use 24 hours a day and (b) in the case of those axle weighbridges not open for use 24 hours a day, the hours when the three enforcement agencies used each weighbridge for enforcement checks during the month of September 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: The dynamic axle weighbridges provided with a self-weigh facility at the ports of Plymouth, Poole, Dover East and Dover West are available for use by drivers and enforcement staff at any time, as is the self-weigh axle weighbridge at Gildersome, west Yorkshire.

All axle weighbridges were used regularly by staff of all three enforcement agencies during September 1984 on an average of two days a week.

Methyl Isocyanate

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the routes along which methyl isocyanate is transported within the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) on 17 December 1984, at column 67. I am not aware of any other bulk movements of methyl isocyanate, but there is no requirement for such movements to be notified.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has completed his review of the way in which methyl isocyanate is transported following the Bhopal disaster.

Mrs. Chalker: The investigations of the Indian authorities into the Bhopal disaster have not yet been completed. When they are, we will consider whether there are any lessons that may be applied to transport in this country.

Buses

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the date on which he is going to present the Bill based on the buses White Paper together with the dates on which he intends to bring in the deregulation of passenger transport and the obligation on municipal operators to form separate companies.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) on 14 January, at column 3.

Acle (Bypass)

Mr. Ryder asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to issue notices in connection with the Acle bypass.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend hopes to be able to publish the draft orders for the bypass in the spring.

Aerial Spraying

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many inspectors are employed by the Civil Aviation Authority in connection with aerial spraying.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority employs eight investigation officers. These deal with all breaches of aviation regulations, not just with aerial spraying. On aerial spraying the CAA co-operates closely with the Health and Safety Executive's agricultural inspectorate, which has a larger number of investigators

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the areas of (a) agricultural land and (b) woodland sprayed in each year since 1977 by (i) fixed wing aircraft and (ii) helicopters; if he will give for each year the total number of aircraft involved; and if he will estimate for each year the proportion accounted for by pesticide application.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I will let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Stockbridge, Keighley

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport when a full reply will be sent to the hon. Member for Keighley about the matters raised in his letters of 14 June 1984 and 20 August 1984 addressed to the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), conerning the problems of residents in the Stockbridge area of Keighley.

Mrs. Chalker: I expect to be able to reply to the hon. Member's letters very shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pollution Control

Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recommendations on good agricultural practice he proposes to make in accordance with section 31 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974.

Mr. Jopling: The Secretary of State for Wales and I have published today a code of good agricultural practice which gives guidance to farmers on minimising the risk of water pollution from fertilisers, pesticides, manures, silage and farm wastes. The code has been prepared in consultation with the farming and water industries and other interested organisations. The main points of the code are highlighted in a guide which is being sent to all farmers in England and Wales.

This marks a further step in the Government's programme for environmental protection. By adhering to the published guidelines, farmers will help to reduce the current level of water pollution, which is a matter of concern to us all. I believe that the vast majority of farmers care for the countryside in which they live, and I urge them all to follow the code.

The code relates to section 31 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. Under this section, it is an offence knowingly to permit any poisonous, noxious or polluting substances to enter water, including underground water. The section recognises that farmers use potentially polluting substances in the course of normal farming practices which may result in the accidental pollution of water. It therefore provides that no offence is committed if the pollution was caused through an action in accordance with good agricultural practice.

The code summarises the main operating points and refers to advisory publications available from my Ministry and other sources for advice on specific details. If farmers are in any doubt whether an activity is likely to cause pollution, they should consult my agricultural development and advisory service or the local water authority.

Research, Development and Advisory Services

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on planned expenditure by the agricultural departments on research and development and advisory services.

Mr. Jopling: In the Government's expenditure plans, published today, provision for expenditure by the Agriculture Departments on research and development has been reduced by £10 million in 1986-87 and by £20 million in 1987-88 and on advisory services by £20 million in 1987-88. There are no reductions in planned expenditure for 1985-86. These changes reflect the Government's aim that industry should make a greater financial contribution towards research and development from which it benefits and to the cost of advisory services funded by the Agriculture Departments. As the White Paper makes clear, the figures are provisional and will be influenced by the progress made on the implementation of the Bell report and the scope for industry support of research undertaken by the public sector. The Agriculture Ministers have asked the Priorities Board on Research and Development in Agriculture and Food to consider and advise on the allocation of resources between the different sectors of agriculture and food research, taking account of future priorities for the direction of research and the scope and prospects for increased levels of industry funding.

The proposed reductions in expenditure will be shared between the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. MAFF expects to reduce expenditure on research by about £8·25 million in 1986-87 and by £16·5 million in 1987-88 and to reduce expenditure on advisory services by about £16·5 million in 1987-88. Part of the reduction will be borne by fisheries research — about £500,000 in 1986-87 and £1 million in 1987-88.

Agricultural Lettings

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the number of extra lettings that have occurred as a result of the Agriculture Holdings Act 1984 and the betterment in rent that has resulted.

Mrs. Fenner: It is far too early to try to assess what effect the provisions of the 1984 Act may have had on the number of lettings. As far as rents are concerned, the Government made it clear during the passage of the Bill through Parliament that the new rent formula was designed to do no more than give legal cover to the approach already adopted by arbitrators generally. I would not, therefore, expect the 1984 Act itself to have any marked effect on the level of rents.

Pesticides

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to implement the recommendation of the Royal Commission on environmental pollution that data on the quantities of active ingredients in pesticides manufactured and sold should be made freely available.

Mrs. Fenner: Following publication of the Government's response to the Seventh Report of the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution ("Agriculture and Pollution" Pollution Paper No. 21, 1983) officials met representatives of trade associations and data users to assess what data exists on quantities of active ingredients manufactured and sold. Since then we have introduced, in the Food and Environment Protection Bill, proposals for pesticides legislation. It is our intention, through regulations made under that Bill, to require manufacturers and others to keep certain records. We are also considering ways and means of making usage data more immediately accessible to interested parties. This issue will be discussed in detail with manufacturers, users, environmental groups and others interested in the data during the consultations on the proposed regulations.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what organochlorine pesticides are currently cleared for use in agriculture; and, at the latest date for which figures are available, what was the estimated quantity of their use (a) in spray hectares and (b) in tonnes of active ingredient.

Mrs. Fenner: There are a number of organic pesticides which contain chlorine and could therefore be broadly defined as 'organochlorines'. However, the normal interpretation of this term is specific to those organochlorine compounds which can persist in the environment to a greater or lesser extent. Pesticides which fall into this category and are cleared under the pesticides safety precautions scheme for certain specific purposes in agriculture are:

Aldrin.
Chlordane.
Lindane.

As regards the question on usage, I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 21 January 1985 to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies).

Fishing Vessels

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list in the Official Report (a) the number and types of fishing vessels which have qualified for de-commissioning grants from the European Economic Community that were constructed with the aid of grants and loans from the White Fish Authority and (b) the amount of this financial assistance per vessel.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 199]: The number of vessels in respect of which reimbursement of part of the cost of decommissioning grants has been sought for the period January to December 1984 from the European Commission and which have been subject to grants or loans from the White Fish Authority or the Sea Fish Industry Authority is as follows:

		Total assistance from WFA or SFIA £
(i) England
Freezer Trawlers	3	1,054,638
Near Water Vessels
Stern Trawlers	4	796,649
	TOTAL	1,851,287

DEFENCE

Foreign Armed Forces

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the countries whose armed forces have been provided with interrogation resistance training by Her Majesty's armed forces during the period 1980 to 1984;

(2) if he will list the countries whose police or paramilitary forces have been provided with interrogation resistance training by Her Majesty's armed forces during the period 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Lee: As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, made clear on 22 February at col. 548, practical training in resistance to interrogation is made available only to members of the armed forces of NATO countries and other close allies, who participate as volunteers and with their own Government's approval. The number is about 50 a year. It is not our practice to detail the specific countries to which we give certain types of training.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence if training in the protection of human rights is an integral part of training provided to foreign military personnel by Her Majesty's armed forces.

Mr. Lee: The protection of human rights is part of the syllabus of some courses in the United Kingdom which are open to foreign nationals.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the principles of the United Nations code of conduct for law enforcement officials are embodied in training provided to foreign police or paramilitary forces by Her Majesty's armed forces.

Mr. Lee: No, but all our training complies with United Kingdom and international law.

Equipment and Weapons (Costs)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence what effect the falling pound has had on the purchase of defence equipment and weapons from the United States of America; and if he intends re-thinking any of the decisions incorporated in his 1984 statement on defence as a result of the weakness of the pound against the dollar.

Mr. Butler: Inevitably, any relative weakness of the pound against the dollar at time of payment will have an adverse effect on the cost of the small proportion of the United Kingdom's defence equipment requirement which is purchased in America. Procurement plans are kept under continual review, taking price and all other relevant factors into account.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if agreements to purchase defence equipment and weapons from the United States of America are made at fixed rates of exchange between the US dollar and the pound at the time of signature or at the prevailing market rate when each progress payment falls due.

Mr. Butler: The vast majority of agreements to purchase defence equipment and weapons from the United States are expressed in dollars, being either procurement from the US Department of Defence under their foreign military sales procedures or direct contracts with US companies placed by our procurement office in Washington. The dollars required are purchased at the rate of exchange prevailing when payments are made. In addition, a few contracts are placed in sterling with United Kingdom agents of US companies.

Ethiopia Famine (Hercules Aircraft)

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how long he intends to maintain C130 Hercules aircraft of Royal Air Force Support Command on famine relief duties in Ethiopia.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) on 18 January at column 247.

Service Personnel (Costs)

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the approximate per capita annual cost of (a) a Regular Army soldier, (b) a Territorial and (c) a member of the Home Service Force, taking account of total employment costs, including remuneration, pension (where applicable), training and personal equipment costs.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1984, c. 323]: The estimated average annual cost, at 1984-85 prices, for each of these categories is as follows:

Regular Army soldier	11,900
Territorial Army soldier	2,547
Member of the Home Service Force	574

These figures cover pay and allowances, personal equipment and other support costs and in the case of the regular army soldier elements for training and non-effective benefits. Training cost figures for territorial army soldiers and members of the home service force are not separately identifiable without disproportionate cost and effort.

SOCIAL SERVICES

External Consultants

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what level of spending has been devoted by his Department to external consultancy work in each year since 1979.

Mr. Fowler: The information is as follows:

1979-80	411,026
1980-81	390,930
1981-82	731,276
1982-83	1,315,588
1983-84	3,622,887
*1984-85	3,711,596

* To 30 November 1984

The main reason for the recent increase has been the need to obtain experienced technical assistance with the development of advanced online computer systems for social security operations.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will include in his final arrangements for National Health Service limited list prescribing, a procedure whereby a general practitioner may prescribe under the National Health Service medicines which are not on the proposed limited list in any case where the doctor has good grounds to believe that his patient's clinical needs cannot be met from the approved list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. This will not be necessary, as we intend to produce a list of drugs prescribable on the National Health Service which will meet all clinical needs.

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why no provision was made for suitable antacids to be available for National Health Service prescription during pregnancy under his proposed draft limited list;

(2) why no provision was made for suitable laxatives to be available for National Health Service prescription during pregnancy under his draft proposed limited list;

(3) why no provision was made for multi-vitamin preparations to be available for use in treatment of premature infants on National Health Service prescription in his draft proposed limited list;

(4) why no provision was made for codeine phosphate to be available for National Health Service prescription in cases of head injury under his provisional proposals for a limited list;

(5) why no provision was included for antitussive cough medicine suitable for prescription to diabetics to be available under his draft proposed National Health Service limited list;

(6) why no provision has been made for long-acting mild analgesics to be available for National Health Service prescription under his draft limited list proposals.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are considering all these matters very carefully during our consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry. We will take the advice of the Chief Medical Officer and a panel he has assembled of distinguished doctors and pharmacists on the medical issues concerned. We intend to produce a limited list which will cover all clinical needs.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the drugs which dentists may currently prescribe on the National Health Service but which he proposes after 1 April should cease to be available on National Health Service prescription; if he will explain the reasons for this proposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are presently consulting on the content of the limited list. Until this consultation is complete it will not be possible to list the medicines presently prescribable by dentists which will no longer be available under the National Health Service. Our stated intention is to ensure that within the categories of drugs to be included in the limited list there will be an adequate range of effective drugs, sufficient to meet all clinical needs.

Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the net return at historic cost for (a) the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry as a whole and (b) pharmaceutical companies engaged in supplying products to the National Health Service in each year since 1960.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This information is not available from official sources.

Death Grant

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage amount of an average funeral cost is covered by the death grant.

Mr. Whitney: The standard rate death grant covers between 5 and 9 per cent. of the cost of an average funeral.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish a table showing the cost of increasing the death grant to £50, £100, £150, £200, £250, £300, £350 and £400 (a) under present eligibility rules and (b) if the current restrictions to benefit were removed.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is given in the table.

£	Death grant payable under present eligibility rules £ million	Death grant payable if current restrictions to benefit removed £ million
50	11	14
100	40	45
150	69	77
200	98	110
250	128	142
300	157	175
350	187	209
400	217	243

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people would be eligible for the death grant if eligibility were restricted to those on supplementary benefit, family income supplement and housing benefit; and at what level the grant could then be paid for the same total annual expenditure.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that some 240,000 people would qualify for death grant if eligibility were restricted to people responsible for funeral expenses who were receiving supplementary benefit, family income supplement or housing benefit. If expenditure were limited to the present total, a grant of around £70 could be paid to this number of beneficiaries.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will estimate the cost of raising the death grant to £300 for parents of children who die under the age of 16 years.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that to pay a death grant of £300 in respect of all children who die under the age of 16 would cost an additional £3 million.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will estimate the cost of extending entitlement to full rate death grant to all men aged over 90 years and women aged over 85 years.

Mr. Whitney: To pay a death grant of £30 in respect of deaths of men over age 90 and women over 85 would cost an extra £1 million.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report details of the categories of people who do not qualify for death grant; and whether he will estimate the number of people involved.

Mr. Whitney: The following do not qualify for payment of a death grant:

Men born before 5 July 1883
Women born before 5 July 1888
Stillborn babies

In June 1983 there were an estimated 1,500 men born before 5 July 1883 and 28,500 women born before 5 July 1888 living in England and Wales. Figures for Scotland are not available in this form. In 1983 (the latest year for which figures are available) there were around 3,600 stillbirths in England and Wales and 380 in Scotland.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what figure his Department calculates as representing the average cost of a simple funeral, as referred to in paragraph 11 of the consultative document, "The Death Grant"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: The Department does not collect figures on funeral costs, but I understand that the current cost of a simple funeral ranges widely from £350 upwards.

Dignity in Death Alliance

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last met representatives from the Dignity in Death Alliance.

Mr. Whitney: Neither my right hon. Friend nor any other Social Security Minister has had any meetings with the Dignity in Death Alliance.

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each county council in England and Wales the number of occupational therapists employed by social services departments in 1980 and in the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The available information is as follows:

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each regional health authority in England and Wales the number of occupational therapists employed in 1980 and in the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Figures for Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. The figures for England are as follows:

National Health Service
Occupational Therapists in each Regional Health Authority in England at 30 September each year
Whole time equivalent

Regional Health Authority	1980	1983
Northern	103	132

Board and Lodging (Islington)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many 16 and 17-year-olds are currently in receipt of benefit whilst in board and lodging in Islington.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that this information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Asian Mother and Baby Campaign

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the amount of public funds going to the Asian Mother and Baby Campaign recently launched by Princess Anne; and if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Government's commitment to this campaign.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The cost to central funds of the campaign is expected to be about £1·3 million. As I made clear both at the national launch in September and again at the first of the local launches, in Birmingham, in December, the Government were responsible for launching this campaign and are fully committed to it.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the areas where the Asian Mother and Baby Campaign is (a) currently operating and (b) proposing to operate; and whether he will facilitate its operation in Waltham Forest.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Link workers are now operating in Birmingham, are training in Leicestershire, and are expected to be appointed in Bradford, Bolton, Blackburn and Newham within the next few months. The remaining four or five areas to which the link worker scheme is to be extended have not yet been determined, but Waltham Forest is one of those being considered.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the link workers of the Asian Mother and Baby Campaign are proposed to be temporary or permanent appointments.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Link workers are being appointed with support from central funds for a fixed term of two years. At the end of that period it will be for the health authorities concerned to decide whether and on what terms to offer a new contract.

Draughtproofing Grants

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of people in Leyton and Waltham Forest who (a) claimed and (b) were eligible for draughtproofing grants in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Contraceptive Implants

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the pharmaceutical company Schering has made any application for a contraceptive licence for any contraceptive implants.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Information cannot be given on applications for licences under the Medicines Act for reasons of commercial confidentiality. The company has been granted a licence to market an intra-uterine contraceptive device called Nova T, although this would not come strictly within the term "implant".

Cervical Cytology

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the cervical cytology research which his Department is funding into the effectiveness of a local call system to be completed; and whether he will publish these research findings.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This study is included in a research project being supported by our Department at the University of Manchester department of epidemiology and social research. It is expected to be completed in mid-1987. Researchers supported from DHSS funds are always encouraged to publish their findings.

Patients (Money)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will outline the procedures followed by National Health Service hospitals regarding money paid for safekeeping into hospital accounts by patients; how such accounts are administered; what are the criteria governing withdrawals; how sums deposited are accounted for at the end of a patient's hoapital stay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Guidance on the administrative arrangements for the custody, withdrawal and disposal of money held by National Health Service hospitals on behalf of patients is contained in the "Hospital Memorandum on Patients' Moneys" (HM(71)90) supplemented by more detailed advice in a booklet "Patients' Property, Income and Allowances" which was commended to health authorities and secretaries of boards of governors on 21 September 1979. Copies of both these documents are in the Library.

We are currently preparing revised guidance for consultation.

Ambulance Provision

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report by county the provision of ambulances per 10,000 population.

Mr. John Patten: Based on the latest available statistics* and in the form in which they are recorded, the total number of ambulances per 100,000 population for each ambulance service authority in England in 1982-83 is set out in the following table.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the level of supplementary benefit income disregard for those not required to register if its real value was the equivalent to November 1975.

Mr. Whitney: On the basis of the retail prices index for December 1984 the information is as follows:

	Disregard of earnings of those not required to register
November 1975	4
December 1984	9·94

Hospital-based Local Pharmacopoeias

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce an extension of the use of hospital-based local pharmacopoeias into general practice, either generally or on a pilot basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A number of practices in general practice already have their own pharmacopoeias. We are considering commissioning research into this subject.

Tobacco Smoking

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many hon. Members have written to him in connection with the information that many general practitioners are sending on the death of constituents due to tobacco smoking.

Mr. John Patten: Five.

Nurses (Education)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of the submission he has made to the Commission on nursing education organised by the Royal College of Nursing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have made no submission to the Commission on nursing education.

Rubella

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (a) what is the incidence of rubella handicapped births and (b) what is the rubella immunisation rate for each of the regional health authorities.

Mr. John Patten: In 1983, the latest year for which figures are available from the national congenital rubella surveillance programme, 17 children were born in England with confirmed rubella defects out of 593,255 live births. This may not be the final figure, as the condition is not always diagnosable in the first year of life.

For girls aged 14, the estimated percentage uptake rates of rubella immunisation for 1983 are as follows:

AIDS

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the increase in the number of people in England and Wales suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and what is his prognosis of the further spread of the disease.

Sir Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend, the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) on 18 January at column 222. It is too early to predict the future spread of the disease with any accuracy. We hope that the rate of increase of cases will be less than that of the United States of America because we have evidence that some people in the at risk groups have been changing their behaviour in response to the threat of the disease.

Spina Bifida

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the number of children born with spina bifida in each of the years 1978 to 1984.

Mr. John Patten: The available information is shown in the table:

Number of babies born with spina bifida 1978 to 1983
England and Wales

Year	Number of babies
1978	841
1979	845
1980	756
1981	633
1982	511
1983	422

Note: Figures are derived from a voluntary system of notifying congenital malformations observed at birth or up to seven days after birth and are therefore an incomplete measure of the total number of affected infants, since many are not diagnosed until after the first week of life.

Heart Transplants

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the expert evaluation being conducted on behalf of his Department on the costs and benefits of heart transplants will be published.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We hope to publish in the early spring.

NHS (Central Services)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the manner of the answer to the hon.

Member for Norfolk, North of 21 December, Official Report, columns 412-4, he will provide figures for expenditure by the family practitioner services, the Dental Estimates Board, the Prescription Pricing Authority and other special health authorities providing National Health Service central services for 1983-84; and if he will also publish comparable figures, at current and at 1983-84 prices, and comparable percentages for 1960 and 1970, for the above categories and those in the original answer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the Government's plans for spending on the National Health Service in England over the next three years.

Mr. Fowler: The plans contained in the 1985 public expenditure White Paper, published today as Cmnd. 9428 provide for expenditure amounting to £14·1 billion on the National Health Service in England during 1985-86. This is over £600 million more than in 1984-85. Spending is planned to rise by some £2·1 billion over the three years to 1987-88. Spending on the hospital and community health services is planned to rise by one per cent. above forecast inflation in each of the next three years in recognition of the increasing number of elderly people. We are also continuing to provide for the increased demands on the Family Practitioner Service. Details are given in chapter 3.11 of the White Paper.

Bassetlaw District Hospital

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many operations have had to be postponed at Bassetlaw district hospital due to a shortage of doctors; and when permission will be given to the hospital to train junior doctors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 345]: We do not collect detailed local information on numbers of operations postponed and the reasons for their postponement. The hon. Member may wish to seek information from the chairman of Bassetlaw health authority.

The educational approval of hospital posts for the training of junior doctors is a matter for the royal colleges and not for Ministers and the Government.

TRANSPORT

Civil Aircraft (Control Services)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Civil Aviation Authority has taken in response to the recommendations of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the authority's provision of navigation and air traffic control services to civil aircraft published on 9 November 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am pleased to be able to report that the authority has made good progress in each of the main areas in which the Monopolies and Mergers Commission found scope for improving efficiency and reducing costs.

The authority has responded very positively to the recommendation that first priority should be given to the use of manpower. A field resource planning office has been established to work out ways of improving the cost-effectiveness of field staff; proposals for a revised pay and grade structure for air traffic controllers have been put to the unions; the health factors underlying the rostering of controllers have been reviewed; consultants have reported on how their utilisation might be improved; and a programme to measure staff utilisation at maintenance units has been started. Together these steps represent a sound start to the task of improving the use of staff resources.

To strengthen control of costs a director of finance for air traffic services has been appointed together with appropriate support staff, a value for money auditing team is being established and action has been taken through Eurocontrol to accelerate payments by users.

To deal with weaknesses in investment approval and project management identified by the commission, new procedures have been introduced to improve the control of work and its cost and have been embodied in a new project management manual. Formal criteria for investment appraisal are to be developed in consultation with my Department.

Progress has also been made on the maintenance of equipment and the use of modern labour-saving equipment. Staff savings have already been made through the introduction of remote control and monitoring systems. They have attracted a good deal of interest from other countries, and the authority plans to incorporate similar systems in other major installations when new equipment is installed. The authority has adopted performance indicators which compare the capacity in major parts of the air traffic control system, the actual numbers of aircraft movements, manpower and cost. While capacity and movements have increased substantially, manpower and unit costs have decreased and the authority expects this trend to contunue. The use of performance indicators as a measure of civil air traffic control service efficiency will be extended to cover all major services within the next 18 months.

The authority has put forward detailed proposals for revising and strengthening the membership and terms of reference of the Air Traffic Control Board in response to the MMC's doubts about the effects of the division of responsibility for national air traffic services between the CAA board and the MOD. These are currently under discussion with the authority.

The ultimate test of the action taken is whether or not it results in improvements in efficiency. It is too early to expect measureable improvements, but I am encouraged by the increased awareness which is evident from the response of the importance of controlling costs whilst at the same time maintaining a high standard of service and safety. The Department will be monitoring closely the progress made by the authority as part of the annual discussions of the CAA's corporate plan.

The CAA has prepared a report detailing the action taken, and I have arranged for copies of this to be placed in the Library.

Coaches (Speed Surveys)

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the results of the surveys of coach speeds on motorways and dual carriageways during 1984 are now available.

Mrs. Chalker: Yes, the full results will be published in a statistical bulletin next month, but the following table sets out the main figures for the 1984 surveys in comparison with those undertaken in 1983:

Observations of coach speeds 1983-84
Motorways

Date	August 1983	November 1983	August 1984	November 1984
Number of observations	130	1,163	1,933	1,054
Mean speed (mph)	66·5	62·9	63·2	63·7
Percentage exceeding 70 mph	31	24	24	26
Percentage exceeding 75 mph	na	13	12	12
85 percentile	73	73	73	73

Speeds in August and November 1984 are not significantly different. All three later surveys show a lower mean speed and a smaller proportion of coaches exceeding 70 mph than the first survey. However, the first survey results are based on a sample of only 130 observations. The 85 percentile—85 per cent. of coaches travel at a speed lower than 85 percentile—is constant.

Observations of coach speeds 1983-84
Dual carriageways

Date	July 1983	November 1983	August 1984	November 1984
Number of observations	431	—	568	346
Mean speed	53·5	—	54·4	51·7
Percentage exceeding 50 mph	64	—	76	66
Percentage exceeding 60 mph	20	—	30	19
85 percentile	61	—	63	60

The speed limit for coaches on dual carriageways was raised from 50 mph to 60 mph in March 1984. Neither the mean speed nor the 85 percentile has changed significantly between July 1983 and November 1984.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost to the Metropolitan police of the supply of police to mining areas and central operations run from London in relation to policing there.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The additional cost of the aid provided last year by the Metropolitan police to other forces in connection with the miners' dispute is estimated at some £14 million, to be recovered from the aided forces. The additional cost of operating the national reporting centre at New Scotland Yard during 1984 is estimated at about £130,000.

Community Radio

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the development of community radio.

Mr. Brittan: Although there is as yet no precise definition of community radio, it is most commonly seen as representing a third tier of radio quite distinct from those services at present provided by the BBC and the IBA, and it describes two possible concepts. One represents the most local form of broadcasting: a low-power transmitter broadcasting to the immediate neighbourhood, with the close involvement of the community. The other is of a station broadcasting across a wider area to what is called a "community of interest", such as an ethnic minority, or the enthusiasts for a particular kind of music.

I have for some time been interested in the idea of community radio and I am anxious to provide the opportunity for its development. It has, however, been difficult to assess what scope there might be for community radio in frequency terms, in advance of the international conference held at the end of last year which planned the expansion of the VHF waveband. In the light of that conference, we now know what spectrum will be available to the United Kingdom, in what time scale, so that it will now be possible to establish what assignments could be devoted to community radio.

None the less, there remain some decisions which need to be taken, and the new frequencies will in any event not be available for some time. There will almost certainly be more would-be broadcasters than frequencies available. We shall therefore need to decide how to choose between competing applicants, and how the new stations are to be financed. We shall also have to consider what limits, if any, should be placed on what can be broadcast, and what the relationship should be with existing local radio stations.

I am firmly resolved to reach practical and positive decisions on all these matters as quickly as possible, because I believe that community radio is a constructive development which should now be given a clear impetus. Community radio will promote self-help, increase freedom of speech, and be of value to many local communities.

It is important to distinguish between community radio and the present pirate stations, which cause interference, steal news broadcasts and other copyright material, and operate in flagrant defiance of the law. The Government will continue to take action against the pirates, in order to retain control of the spectrum for licensed broadcasters. These will include, as soon as the necessary decisions can be implemented, community radio stations — perhaps starting with some experimental stations and building up as frequencies become available. But there will not be room for any community radio if the pirates have occupied all the spectrum beforehand.

I hope to make a further statement before too long in the light of our study of how the development of community radio can best be taken forward.

ENERGY

Offshore Licensing

Mr. Needham asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to announce licence awards under the ninth round of offshore licensing.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am now able to announce awards for the 13 cash tender blocks applied for in the ninth round. These awards go to the highest bidder in each case and complete the cash tender part of the round. The bids total £121·3 million; the highest was £25·5 million from BP for block 15/18b. Full details are set out in a note which has today been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The assessment of applications for blocks in the "discretionary" part of the round is proceeding, and I hope to be able to announce awards for these in April or May.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Industrial Development Board

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the total number of new jobs announced by the Industrial Development Board for the year ended 31 December 1984; and how many of these jobs will be provided by Northern Ireland firms, Great Britain's firms and foreign firms, respectively;

(2) how many new firms, based, respectively, in Northern Ireland, Great Britain and in foreign countries, announced their intention during the year ended 31 December 1984 to locate in Northern Ireland and provide employment.

Dr. Boyson: In the year ended 31 December 1984, the Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland promoted 5,189 new jobs. These were promoted as follows:

	Number
Northern Ireland firms	1,508
Great Britain firms	1,150
Foreign firms	2,531
Total	5,189

The 1,508 new jobs promoted by Northern Ireland-owned companies involved 41 companies. Of these, six were new companies set up in Northern Ireland and the related employment was 264.

The 1,150 jobs arising from Great Britain-owned firms came from 26 companies. Of these three were new companies to Northern Ireland and the related employment was 87.

The 2,531 jobs from foreign-owned firms came from 22 companies. Of these, four were new companies to Northern Ireland and the related employment was 585.

Trainee Nurses

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total intake of young persons as trainee nurses in each of the years 1982, 1983 and 1984; and how many came from the Republic of Ireland in each of those three years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:

Year ending 31 March	1982	1983	1984
Number of Nurse Learners entering training	1,802	1,673	1,508
Number with addresses in the Republic of Ireland	146	53	50

SCOTLAND

Police (Premature Retirement)

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many police officers have submitted premature retirement applications for dates before 19 March; and what was the comparable number for the period 1 January to 19 March 1984.

Mr. Ancram: As the police pension scheme does not prescribe a normal retirement age for police officers—as distinct from a compulsory age — it is not always possible to say whether any particular application to retire is premature. Officers qualify for full pension on completion of 30 years' service, but in many cases they can retire with pension before then.

The information sought is therefore not readily available, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Nor is a meaningful comparison with the period 1 January to 19 March 1984 yet possible, as only one month's notice of retirement is necessary.

Details of retirement in the precise period 1 January to 19 March 1984 are not available, as statistics are collected on a quarterly basis. In the quarter which ended on 31 March 1984, a total of 77 officers retired from forces in Scotland.

County Hospital, Stornoway

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for replacing the County hospital, Stornoway.

Mr. Younger: My Department has under consideration proposals submitted by the Western Isles health board for the replacement of facilities currently provided both by the Lewis and County hospitals, Stornoway.

Free School Transport

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will provide details of the number of pupils for whom education authorities in Scotland provide free school transport.

Mr. Younger: The information from the survey of school transport undertaken in September 1984 is as follows:

	Pupils attending primary schools	Pupils attending secondary schools	Pupils attending special schools or classes	Total pupils
Free transport provided under section 50 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980	37,697	106,844	9,401	153,942
Free transport provided in spare seats under section 51(2) of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980	3,167	1,454	127	4,748
Scotland total	40,864	108,298	9,528	158,690

I have arranged for a copy of the return from each authority to be placed in the Library.

EMPLOYMENT

Methyl Isocyanate

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the effect on an unprotected and unprepared civilian population of the accidental discharge of 10 gallons of methyl isocyanate.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Accidental discharges of materials will have different effects according to circumstances. I am advised by the Health and Safety Executive, on the basis of theoretical calculations, that a spillage of 10 gallons of liquid methyl isocyanate in typical British day-time weather might form a pool which would evaporate in about a quarter of an hour if no emergency action were taken. The vapour would be blown downwind as a narrow plume. For a spill of the size envisaged here, the area affected would be small. People who were out of doors would experience irritation of eyes and mucous membranes at distances out to about 200 metres from the spill. Close to the source, serious injuries could result, although people would probably escape by going indoors or walking out of the plume. People indoors would receive considerable protection. Less favourable weather conditions could increase the hazard range, but such conditions are less likely.

Youth Training

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people left youth training schemes before the completion of their first year training in (a) the first six months of 1984 and (b) the second six months of 1984

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 36]: Final figures for 1984 are not yet available. However, it is provisionally estimated that there were about 85,000 young people who left the youth training scheme four weeks or more before their expected completion date in the first half of 1984—not including "early leavers" from Construction Industry Training Board schemes between January and March 1984—and about 95,000 such "early leavers" between July and December 1984. These provisional estimates will be subject to upward revision once further information becomes available after the end of the financial year.

A sample survey of young people who left the scheme between April and July, which included a majority of "early leavers" among those who responded, showed that almost 60 per cent. had gone into jobs.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people were in training on the youth training scheme at the end of each month from April 1983 to August 1984, by mode; and how many young people were in training (a) on current year schemes and (b) on previous year schemes at the end of each month from September 1984 to the latest available month, also by mode.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 285]: The information requested is given in the tables:

Table 1

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Development and Derelict Land Grants

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the full amounts paid to each local authority in England for each year since inception of (a) urban development grants and (b) derelict land grants.

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

GLC (Mortgages)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total sum now outstanding and owed to the Greater London council under mortgage arrangements; and how many such mortgages are at rates of interest currently above the prevailing average building society rate.

Sir George Young: Figures taken from the draft 1985-86 GLC budget document suggest that at 31 July 1984 the council had outstanding debts totalling £306 million secured on 55,000 home loan mortgages. Of these, 29,500 were at fixed rates of interest which can be assumed to be below the rates currently being charged by building societies. 23,500 were subject to interest rates variable at the council's discretion. A further 2,000 were subject to the requirements on rates of interest in section 110 of the Housing Act 1980. Broadly, this would require the rates to be at the higher of the council's average borrowing costs plus ¼per cent. or the standard national rate of interest set by my right hon. Friend. That is currently 11⅝ per cent., in line with the average basic rate charged by building societies from 1 December 1984, but is subject to adjustment in the light of changes in building society interest rates. I regret that more recent information is not available. The GLC may be able to assist my hon. Friend if he requires more information.

Local Authority Expenditure

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each year since 1981 and for each metropolitan district council in Greater Manchester (a) its maximum expenditure entitlement under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 and

(b) the amount spent under section 137 upon (i) measures designed to alleviate unemployment, (ii) economic development initiatives and (iii) grants or other financial support to registered charities in its area to match the existing provision for voluntary bodies.

Mr. Waldegrave: On the basis of information provided by the local authorities concerned, the maximum expenditure entitlement under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 for the metropolitan district councils in Greater Manchester was as follows:

	£000 1981-82	£000 1982-83	£000 1983-84	£000 1984-85
Bolton	993·178	881·248	883·226	869·242
Bury	652·020	601·926	594·130	587·292

Wigan	1,116·894	1,026·042	1,016·000	1,007·426

Information on expenditure on the particular measures mentioned is not collected centrally.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research is being conducted through the Atomic Energy Authority on the longer-term problems of the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Atomic Energy Authority is investigating the corrosion rate of waste containers and methods to contain any released radioactivity within the construction materials of a disposal facility. It also has in hand research into the possibilities for migration of radionuclides in groundwater moving through geological strata.

Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government have submitted their report to the Paris commission outlining measures being taken to meet the commission's recommendations that the best available technology should be taken account of at nuclear reprocessing plants in order to minimise radioactive discharges to the marine environment.

Mr. Waldegrave: A report by the United Kingdom was submitted to the Paris commission on 27 December. I have placed copies in the Library of the House.

PRIME MINISTER

Plutonium

Mr. George Robertson asked the Prime Minister if any plutonium produced by British civil reactors is being used in the United Kingdom nuclear weapons programme.

The Prime Minister: Plutonium from CEGB and SSEB power stations is not used for nuclear weapons.

Safety Standards

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what arrangements exist in the nationalised industries, consequent upon the repeal of the fair wages clause, for the trade unions to be consulted about the maintenance by contractors employed by the industries of the safety standards established by the industries themselves; and whether there is provision for requiring the observance of terms and conditions of employment recommended by the relevant trade associations.

The Prime Minister: The fair wages resolution applied to Government Departments only. However, many nationalised industries included in their contracts fair wages clauses similar to those of the resolution. The resolution did not apply to safety standards. The responsibilities of employers to consult on matters of safety are laid out in the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations 1977 and in section 2 of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. Arrangements in the nationalised industries for negotiating terms and conditions with subcontractors, including trade union consultation, are matters for the managements of the industries themselves.

Local Authorities (Government Grants)

Mr. Favell asked the Prime Minister how much has been paid by central Government in grants and subsidies for which local authorities are the ultimate recipients, showing separately (a) rate support grants, (b) rent and rate rebates and housing benefit, (c) housing subsidies and (d) any other grants or subsidies, divided by category for each year from 1978-79 to 1984-85, giving the figures both in cash terms and expressed at current prices; and if she will provide similar data in respect of each individual metropolitan county council and each of the metropolitan borough councils within their areas.

The Prime Minister: I shall reply to my hon. Friend shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Local Enterprise Week

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Government intend to hold Local Enterprise Week in 1985.

Mr. Trippier: Local Enterprise Week 1985 will be held from Wednesday 15 May to Friday 24 May.

Independent Cinemas (Access to Films)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is now in a position to make a statement on the recommendation of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report, Cmnd. 8858, in relation to a limited experiment in Glasgow and Manchester for the independent cinemas in those cities to be afforded the same rights of access to films as EMI and Rank.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes. Following a period of consultation after the publication of the report, I announced that I had asked the Director General of Fair Trading as an initial step to arrange for an experimental regime based on the Commission's recommendation on barring and a four-week limit to delays in the release of popular films, to be applied in selected locations, and to report back to me. As I said in answer to the hon. Member on 26 November 1984, the Director General encountered difficulties in setting up the experiment and I have been considering the position. I have held a number of meetings with representatives of exhibitors and distributors, and I am pleased to say that all have agreed in principle to give undertakings to participate in the experiment. The Government remain committed to this course, and we intend to finalise details shortly to enable the Director General to proceed with the experiment as soon as possible.

Manufactured Exports

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of Scottish manufactured exports, at constant 1980 prices, in each year since 1978; and what were the comparable figures for the United Kingdom as a whole over the same period.

Mr. Channon: The information requested is not available. Estimates of the value of exports through Scottish ports can be found in the "Scottish Economic Bulletin." More rigorous estimates of Scottish manufactured exports, for 1979 only, are given in the "Scottish Input/Output tables for 1979", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Technology Transfers

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has now prepared and submitted Her Majesty's Government's response to the request by the European Commission for information on United States' measures to restrict technology transfers.

Mr. Channon: Yes.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any information as to the additional costs incurred by the British Steel Corporation to date arising from the strike in the mining industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: BSC's interim results for the half year ended 29 September 1984 show the effect of the miners' strike to be about £3·6 million per week. I understand tht costs have since then been running at around the same weekly rate.

Computer Translation (Esperanto)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action the Government are taking on research into computer translation through the use of Esperanto following the study and reports made by the European Economic Community Commission.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to the reply, 22 January 1985; c. 370]: We are taking no action following this study. The European Commission has itself decided not to pursue this work any further. We are, however, very aware of the importance of promoting developments in machine translation and are supporting the Commission in its work with the Systran system and research in the Eurotra project.

Accounting Documents (Statutory Audits)

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will explain more fully the meaning of the words professional integrity in article 23 of the EEC eighth directive of 10 April 1984 on approval of persons responsible for carrying out the statutory audits of accounting documents; and whether these words include professional competence.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to the reply, 22 January 1985; c. 370]: This directive is Community law, and its interpretation must ultimately be a matter for the courts.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Assaults)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many cases of assaults on teachers by pupils in (a) secondary and (b) primary schools have been recorded during each of the past 10 years for which figures are available; and how many of these resulted in legal action.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what recent representations he has received about the incidence of assaults on teachers by pupils; and what reply he has given;

(2) whether he plans any initiatives to reduce the incidence of assaults on teachers by pupils.

Mr. Dunn: While my right hon. Friend has received many recent representations about school discipline in general and corporal punishment in particular, very few have referred specifically to assaults on teachers. The Government deplore all physical attacks on teachers, but responsibility must be with local education authorities and schools which are in a position to take firm action swiftly.

CIVIL SERVICE

GCHQ, Cheltenham

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service if, when he next meets the First Division Association, he will discuss the Civil Service-wide implications of the withdrawal of trade union rights from GCHQ, Cheltenham.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have no plans to meet the First Division Association. I am always willing to consider representations made by trade unions on Civil Service-wide matters. If and when a meeting does take place which touches on this question, I shall reiterate what has repeatedly been made clear: that it is emphatically not the Government's intention to extend the measures in force at GCHQ beyond those agencies whose primary functions are concerned with security and intelligence.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Palestinian Organisations

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any official British aid was given to organisations working on behalf of Palestinian organisations, wherever located, in the years 1979 to 1983.

Mr. Raison: Our aid is designed to benefit Palestinians who need assistance. None goes directly to Palestinianorganisations. Our chief contributions to Palestinian welfare have been indirect, through the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), to which we are one of the largest contributors; through the European Community; and through British voluntary agencies working with Palestinians for their welfare and development.

Middle East

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what official aid has been given by the United Kingdom to (a) individual members of the Arab League, and Egypt and (b) non-Arab members of the Islamic Conference Organisation in each year from 1979 to 1983.

Mr. Raison: Official aid was as follows:

1. Members of the League of Arab States

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what amount of official British aid was channelled through United Nations organisations to projects in the West Bank or Gaza strip, or in Palestinian refugee camps in other areas in each year from 1979 to 1983.

Mr. Raison: The United Kingdom makes voluntary contributions towards the general costs of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees in the near East. For the years in question these were:

	£ million
1979	4·4
1980	4·5
1981	5·0
1982	*5·0
1983	5·0

* Includes £1·0 million in food aid.

Projects for the support of Palestinian refugees are also financed from the budgets of UNESCO and UNICEF, to which we contribute.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the cost to date of official visits to provide guidance to the Falkland Islands Government as to how they might develop educational and medical centres.

Mr. Raison: The estimated cost since late 1982 to date is about £24,000.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the latest figure for the cost of his proposal to expand the grassland trial unit, now known as the Falkland Islands agricultural research and development centre;

(2) how much Her Majesty's Government spend and intend to spend on identifying research, and developing and refining methods for the greater production of wool by developing new sheep farming systems in the Falklands;

(3) what decision has been made on the proposal to expand the Falkland Islands agricultural research and development centre.

Mr. Raison: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 July last, at column 477, £2·5 million has been allocated for the expansion and operation of the agricultural research centre, formerly known as the Falkland Islands agricultural research and development centre, over the next five years. The primary objective of the ARC is to identify and develop methods aimed at an increased production of wool through improved nutrition, animal health, husbandry and management.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what loans have now been proposed to encourage small-scale development projects for agricultural improvements in the Falklands.

Mr. Raison: The Falkland Islands Development Corporation has approved loans for equipment for the bakery in Stanley, the establishment of a dairy, a snack bar, and an electrical contracting business. Proposals for the establishment of a dry-cleaning business, market gardening, tannery and skin processing and the development of tourism are under consideration.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what amount of loan he has now been paid for the wool mill at Fox Bay East in the Falklands.

Mr. Raison: The full amount of £130,000 has now been made available.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what assessment is made of the visit to the Falklands by a forestry consultant; and what study is being made of his report;

(2) what consideration Her Majesty's Government have given to the report of the forestry consultant who visited the Falkland Islands in September 1983.

Mr. Raison: The report has been considered carefully by the Falkland Islands Government, who have decided that implementation of the proposals should be deferred for the time being on the grounds of cost and the uncertain benefits compared with other priorities for spending in the agricultural sector. The recommendations will be kept under review by the agricultural research centre and the Falkland Islands Development Corporation.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the estimated cost to date for 1984-85 of the expatriate officers in the Falklands.

Mr. Raison: The estimated cost to end December 1984 is £720,000.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his latest estimate of the cost of plans to improve telecommunications in the Falklands; and if he will make a statement on the consultant's report on this matter.

Mr. Raison: The estimated capital cost of implementing the recommendations made by the consultants is £785,000. This includes the provision of a new automatic telephone exchange and distribution network in Stanley and improved communication links with outlying settlements.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what action is being taken to improve water and power supplies in the Falklands; and at what cost;

(2) what consideration he is giving to the reports of feasibility studies on future long-term power and water requirements in the Falklands.

Mr. Raison: Consultants have reported on the long-term power and water requirements in Stanley. A project to improve power supplies, including additional generating capacity and an improved distribution system, is being undertaken at an estimated cost of £2·9 million. A project to improve the water supply is in preparation. The cost is likely to be about £3 million.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the amount spent so far of the £31 million made available over six years for longer-term economic development of the Falklands.

Mr. Raison: Cumulative expenditure at the end of December was £3·8 million.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the cost to Her Majesty's Government of timber prefabricated houses from Sweden erected in the Falkland Islands;

(2) what is now the completion cost of Brewster houses in Port Stanley; and how much in excess of the tender this is;

(3) what is the latest cost estimate of the 54 Brewster homes on the Falklands.

Mr. Raison: I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member on 14 January at column 19.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what total cost to date Her Majesty's Government have provided fuel, plant, tools, building materials and equipment to the Falkland Islands Government Public Works Department.

Mr. Raison: The cost of providing these items was £2·146 million.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost of the feasibility study on an improved harbour complex in the Falklands, including a new deep water jetty.

Mr. Raison: The final cost is not yet known as the study is still in progress. Expenditure to date is £53,942.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many kilometres of road have now been completed in Port Stanley town and at what cost, broken down into plant, materials, contractors' camp, freight, insurance, management, local costs, and other items;

(2) what has been the cost so far of the repair of roads in Port Stanley and the road to the Port Stanley airport.

Mr. Raison: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 July 1984, at column 475, 11·1 km of roads have been repaired or reconstructed—4·8 km Stanley town roads and 6·3 km airport road. A total of £6·8 million was allocated, including provision for a stone crusher which was not, in the event, used on this project but transferred elsewhere. Estimated expenditure is £6·3 million made up as follows:

	£ thousand
Capital items, plant and spares	1,377
Materials	301
Camp accommodation and equipment	532
Procurement, shipping and insurance	929
Labour and messing	2,348
Management fee	391

	£ thousand
Local costs	389
	6,267

Of this, £3·2 million was for Stanley town roads, £2·9 million for the airport road and £200,000 for minor tasks on behalf of, or materials handed over to, the Public Works Department.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what has been the availability of the hostel for school children in Port Stanley;

(2) what is the cost in 1984-85 of providing permanent boarding school facilities for secondary school children in Port Stanley.

Mr. Raison: At present 18 girls are accommodated in Stanley House and 24 boys in mobile homes in its grounds at an estimated cost to the Falkland Islands Government of £94,280 in 1984-85. Two dormitory blocks are now being erected in the grounds of Stanley House which when completed, will accommodate a total of 84, meeting all the expected demand for boarding facilities. The present estimated cost of the new dormitories is £925,000.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what grants have now been paid for a small scale industrial estate in Port Stanley.

Mr. Raison: Expenditure to date is £26,222.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the cost so far of the repair and replacement of damaged housing in Port Stanley.

Mr. Raison: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 July 1984, at column 476, it is not possible to give a precise figure because the information available cannot be broken down in sufficient detail. Excluding the cost of the prefabricated housing project, part of which was to replace housing destroyed during the conflict in 1982, £360,000 has been spent on repairs to housing.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the payment to James Brewster Associates in relation to their claims for extra costs for Brewster houses in Port Stanley caused by delays in shipping and port handling.

Mr. Raison: Delay claims settled to date total £370,194.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the current rate of occupation for Brewster houses in Port Stanley;

(2) how many Brewster houses on the Falklands are currently unoccupied;

(3) when he hopes to complete sewerage, water and electrical services to make all the Brewster houses in Port Stanley habitable.

Mr. Raison: I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave the hon. Member on 14 January at column 19.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what safety inspection has been undertaken of Stanley House schoolboys' hostel and its electric wiring.

Mr. Raison: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 July last, at column 476, Stanley House was rewired in 1981 and, in accordance with the standard procedure of the Institute of Elctrical Engineers, it would not be due for a complete inspection for five years. However, the kitchem was rewired in March 1983 when new equipment was installed and regular examination of wiring is carried out.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there are now fire hydrants at Stanley House schoolboys' hostel.

Mr. Raison: There is little to add to my reply to the hon. Member on 23 July last, at column 476. There are no fire hydrants in or immediately adjacent to the building, but there are hydrants in streets bordering the plot. There are five extinguishers in Stanley House itself and in every mobile home in the grounds, as well as automatic smoke detectors. There are fire alarm hand bells in Stanley House and in the area adjacent to the mobile homes and fire drills are practised regularly.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of Port Stanley's central roads still need repair.

Mr. Raison: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 July last at column 43, it is estimated that within Stanley town boundaries 3·25 km of surfaced roads require reconstruction or less major patch and fill repairs; and that a further 3·85 km of unsurfaced roads require surfacing.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is satisfied with concrete surfaces on Port Stanley roads.

Mr. Raison: As explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 2 July last, at column 43, 2·285 km of roads in Stanley have been reconstructed in concrete. The surfaces are, I believe, considered satisfactory.

Ethiopia and Sudan (Famine Relief)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his latest estimate to the respective contributions of the United Kingdom and of the European Economic Community towards the relief of famine in Ethiopia and in the Sudan; and how they compare with the contributions of the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, respectively.

Mr. Raison: The United Kingdom's bilateral aid and aid made available by member states through the European Community towards the relief of famine in Ethiopia and Sudan have been as follows:

		Two years to September 1984 (£ million)	Since October 1984 (£ Million)
United Kingdom bilateral aid	Ethiopia	7·7	9·4
	Sudan	*—	4·258
European Community†	Ethiopia	24·3	34·4
	Sudan	1·6	10·1

* Sudan has been a major recipient of British bilateral aid for some years; but it was only in the latter part of 1984 that the failure of the harvest, coupled with influxes of refugees from Ethiopia and Chad, resulted in serious food shortages and the need for relief aid.

† This excludes aid made available bilaterally by the member states of the European Community.

We do not have comparable figures for contributions made by the United States. But the following sums provided and planned in relief aid for the US have been reported.

	October 1983-September 1984 (US $ million)	(£ million)	October 1984-September 1985 (US $ million)	*(£ million)
Ethiopia	16·894	12·069	141·021	117·5
Sudan	36·456	26·044	91·424	76·2

* Converted at the rate of £=$1.20.

We have no figures for relief aid provided by the Soviet Union. The official Soviet newsagency has claimed that substantial relief aid was provided to Ethiopia in the form of food, medicine and transport supplies.

We have no information about any Soviet relief aid to Sudan.

Water Authorities

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will seek a report from the Welsh water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(2) how much of the net total expenditure of the Welsh water authority was spent on maintaining, improving and developing fisheries in pursuance of its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975 in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh water authority reports annually to Ministers on the discharge of its statutory functions, including fisheries, and its expenditure. These reports are laid before Parliament in October each year. The report for the year ended 31 March 1984 indicates that out of £112·745 million in total operating expenditure £1·378 million was spent on fisheries.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps is he taking in association with the Welsh water authority to combat poaching on the River Usk and in the estuary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Combating illegal fishing on the River Usk and in its estuary is the responsibility of the Welsh water authority. The river and estuary are patrolled by six of the authority's bailiffs, suitably equipped for the task. There are also eight honorary bailiffs recruited from fishery interests in the area, to assist with routine enforcement duties.

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied that financial restrictions on Welsh water authority expenditure are not impeding the discharge of its statutory duties to protect fishing waters against salmon poachers and that the authority has sufficient finance to carry out its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am satisfied that the Welsh water authority has access to sufficient financial resources to undertake its fisheries functions and carry out its statutory obligations.

River Usk (Poaching)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of convictions for offences relating to salmon and trout poaching on the River Usk and estuary in each of the last five years; and what penalties were imposed.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Location	Convictions	Penalties	Defendants
1980	River	22	£1.145 fines	Not known
	Estuary	0
1981	River	37	£1,150 fines	14
	Estuary	6	£250 fines	2
1982	River	26	£535 fines	15
	Estuary	3	£200 and confiscation of nets and two months sentence suspended one year for each defendant	3
1983	River	7	£375 fines	3
	Estuary	0
1984	River	8	£210 fines	1
	Estuary	2	Four months suspended for two years each defendant. A subsequent prosecution was taken by the police for the theft of the poacher's boat whilst in water authority custody	2

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to the trend in the level of poaching on the River Usk and estuary; from what organisation she has received information; whether the Welsh water authority has increased protection of its fisheries in recent times under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Although there is no objective measure of the trend in poaching levels, I am advised that illegal fishing activity may have passed its peak in recent years. Information has been provided by the Welsh water authority. The Merthyr Tydfil angling association and some individuals have also submitted their views on fish stocks in the River Usk. Some increase in the protection of fisheries has been achieved through the introduction by the Welsh water authority of new techniques to combat poaching.

Limb Appliance Centre (Bangor)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received advocating a limb appliance centre at Bangor.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Various individuals and organisations have from time to time argued the case for an artificial limb and appliance centre to be located somewhere in north Wales. This case will be considered fully as part of our Department's general review of regional health services in north Wales.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for the most recently available date the notified vacancies for each employment exchange area in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Numbers of notified vacancies at jobcentres, careers offices and professional executive recruitment in Wales are published monthly. The latest available figures published on 3 January are as follows:

Higher Education

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is able to announce his decisions on local authority higher education provision in 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Having consulted the Welsh Joint Education Committee and the Welsh Counties Committee I have decided that the advanced further education quantum for 1985-86 should be set at £28·5 million. This represents a 6·75 per cent. increase between 1984-85 and 1985-86 when allowance is made for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge.

I have received advice from the Wales Advisory Body on the planned disposition of academic provision and of students in local authority higher education. The WAB proposals provide for growth in student numbers in Wales in 1985-86, but with a shift of emphasis towards science, engineering and other vocational disciplines. The proposals include safeguards for sub-degree and part-time courses. WAB has also provided advice on how the AFE quantum of £28·5 million should be distributed between local authorities and I have consulted the WJEC and the WCC on this also. The recommendations put forward by WAB are the result of a planning exercise, which involved consultations with individual local authorities and their higher education establishments about their present and planned provision, and consideration of how local authority higher education in Wales as a whole should be developed. The proposals for distributing the quantum are relatedd to the proposals for target student numbers for 1985-86 by institution, mode of attendance and subject. The method of allocation proposed will put pressure on high-spending institutions to become more cost-effective but will also protect institutions against unacceptably large reductions in their funding between 1984-85 and 1985-86.

I have decided to accept the WAB's advice on academic provision and student numbers and on the distribution of the quantum. Local education authorities have been informed of this decision and of their individual allocations.

Copies of a note explaining the method by which the AFE quantum for 1985-86 have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Turkey

4. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has had any recent discussions with the Turkish Foreign Secretary about human rights in Turkey.

Mr. Renton: We remain in close touch with the Turkish authorities about a range of issues, including human rights. They can be in no doubt as to our opinions. My right hon. and learned Friend last spoke to the Turkish Foreign Minister on this subject last May and will visit Turkey from 11 to 13 of February.

Mr. Yasser Arafat

13. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to meet Mr. Yasser Arafat.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Poland

14. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of Anglo-Polish relations.

Mr. Rifkind: My visit to Poland last November marked the resumption of our bilateral relations at ministerial level. My right hon. and learned Friend will continue this process by visiting Poland from 11 to 13 April.

Our aim is to return to a more normal bilateral relationship and to encourage the process of reconciliation in Poland.

Soviet Union

15. Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans the Government have to develop and improve Anglo-Soviet relations.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We are continuing to develop contacts at all levels with the Soviet Union, and to work generally for better relations between East and West. Mr. Gromyko has accepted my invitation to visit London this year, and my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) will expect to visit Moscow in return for the visit of Mr. Kornienko to London in 1984. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be visiting Moscow in February to open the British Agro-Industrial Exhibition. We shall continue our programme of official level talks on international issues, and there will be exchanges on bilateral trade, cultural and other matters.

27. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to meet the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have invited Mr. Gromyko to visit the United Kingdom this year. He has accepted, and dates are now under discussion.

31. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether a date has yet been fixed for the planned visit by the Soviet Foreign Minister to the United Kingdom.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. Dates are under discussion on diplomatic channels.

34. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he received any assurance from Mr. Gorbachev last month regarding future compliance by the Soviet Union with its international obligations on human rights.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. During my talks with Mr. Gorbachev last month, I urged that the Soviet Union carry out its human rights commitments under the Helsinki Final Act. Regrettably, Mr. Gorbachev's response gave no cause to expect any early change in Soviet attitudes on this question.

Afghanistan

16. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics concerning Soviet occupation of Afghanistan.

Mr. Rifkind: We would like to see a lasting and peaceful settlement in Afghanistan on the basis set out in successive UNGA resolutions. We look to the Soviet Union to open the way to such a settlement by declaring its willingness to withdraw its troops, the presence of whom in this previously independent and non-aligned country remains an affront to international opinion, as well as causing great destruction and suffering to the Afghan people.

My right hon. and learned Friend made our position clear to Mr. Gorbachev during their meeting in London in December, and we will continue to raise this matter in future meetings with Soviet leaders.

Gulf War

17. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of the Gulf war.

Mr. Luce: The conflict between Iran and Iraq remains a cause for international concern, with attacks by both sides continuing on merchant shipping in the Gulf. We welcome the agreement by Iran and Iraq, in June 1984, to refrain from attacks on civilian targets, in response to the appeal by the Secretary-General of the United Nations. The United Kingdom will maintain its support for all efforts to bring about an early settlement.

Libya

18. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about current relations with Libya.

Mr. Luce: We are continuing to work hard in a number of different ways to secure the early release of the four British hostages held in Libya. We are in close touch with their families, and the Italians as protecting power. We also support the Archbishop of Canterbury's personal representative, Mr. Terry Waite, in his humanitarian initiative. As long as the hostages are detained we cannot begin to look at ways of dealing with other problems between us and the Libyan authorites.

Iran

19. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to meet representatives of the Iranian Government to discuss human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to meet representatives of the Iranian Government to discuss human rights. However we have persistently made clear our concern over reported violations of human rights in Iran.

East-West Relations

20. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the state of East-West relations following the recent meeting between the American and Soviet Foreign Ministers in Geneva.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have welcomed the outcome of the meeting between Mr. Gromyko and Mr. Shultz. We hope that the forthcoming negotiations will lead to increased security at a lower level of weapons. Given the complexity of the issues under discussion, progress is not likely to be rapid. Meanwhile, a broader dialogue between the superpowers as well as between the other countries of East and West can help to create the increased trust and confidence which will be necessary if lasting progress is to be made on arms control and on other problems.

33. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last discussed disarmament and East-West relations with the United States Secretary of State.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I held private talks with Mr. Shultz on 11 December, when he visited this country on his way to the NATO ministerial meeting in Brussels. We discussed a range of international issues, including prospects for arms control and disarmament and East-West relations. Mr. Shultz and I took part in further discussions on these subjects in the course of, and in connection with, the NATO ministerial meeting itself.

Council of Foreign Ministers

21. Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when is the next meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the Council of Europe.

Mr. Renton: The next meeting of Foreign Ministers of the Council of Europe will be in Strasbourg on 29 January. My right hon. and learned Friend will attend.

Arab-Israeli Dispute

22. Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards a peace settlement in the middle east.

Mr. Luce: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley).

USA (Strategic Defence Initiative)

23 Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussion he has held with members of the United States Government on the subject of the latter's proposed strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Luce: We continue to maintain the closest contact with the US Administration on the strategic defence initiative. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 9 January, at column 441, she discussed the subject with President Reagan on 22 December 1984.

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the United Kingdom's European allies about the United States strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Luce: We continue to consult closely with all our allies, European as well as American.

Balkan States

24 Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give more emphasis to constructive relations with the Balkan states and with Yugoslavia in particular; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: We already have good relations with the countries of the Balkans, with the exception of the People's Socialist Republic of Albania, which we recognise, but with which we do not have diplomatic relations. My right hon. and learned Friend will have an opportunity to further relations with Romania, Bulgaria and Turkey when he visits these countries next month. Our relations with Yugoslavia are close and substantial in all areas. We value and respect Yugoslavia's constructive role as an independent and non-aligned state and have regular high-level contacts. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister visited Yugoslavia twice in 1980; in November 1983 we welcomed the President of the Federal Executive Council to the United Kingdom; I visited Yugoslavia in May last year; and in November my right hon. and learned Friend had a useful round of political consultations in London with Mr. Dizdarevic, the Federal Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

Antarctic Treaty

25 Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's current position with regard to the Antarctic treaty.

Mr. Renton: As a founder member, we greatly value the Antarctic treaty. It has successfully demilitarised Antarctica, maintained the peace there and helped promote important international scientific cooperation. We shall continue to defend and strengthen the treaty system. We welcome the continuing accession of new member states.

Outer Space

28 Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied that Britain's endorsement of United States policies for outer space is in keeping with the United Kingom's 1967 and 1972 treaty obligations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Like the United States, we remain fully committed to our obligations under the 1967 outer space treaty. Athough not a party to the United States—Soviet anti-ballistic missile treaty of 1972, we have repeatedly made it clear that we regard it as an important element in preserving international peace and stability

Nuclear Disarmament

29 Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives the Government intend to take in 1985 to secure multilateral nuclear disarmament.

Mr. Luce: We shall continue to work for balanced and verifiable agreements in the multilateral disarmament negotiations in which we currently participate. In addition, we shall strongly support the efforts of the United States in the forthcoming arms control talks with the Soviet Union to achieve balanced and verifiable reductions in nuclear arms.

Falkland Islands

30. Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has yet reached a decision on possible future changes in the fishing limits round the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: There are no fishing controls around the Falkland Islands outside the three-mile limit. We are actively considering the possibility of establishing an exclusive fisheries limit, but no decisions have yet been reached.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the shortage of travelling teachers in the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: There is provision for five travelling teachers in the Falkland Islands Education Department establishment. One post became vacant on 9 January 1985 on completion of contract. The Falkland Islands authorities are in the process of recruiting a replacement.

BBC and British Council

32. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning cuts in foreign service posts, British Broadcasting Corporation External Services and the British Council, respectively.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have received a number of letters from right hon. and hon. Members and from members of the public and commercial firms.

International Maritime Organisation

Mr. Iain Mills asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth affairs what grant aid was given to establish the International Maritime Organisation in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: There was no grant aid given to establish the International Maritime Organisation in the United Kingdom.

European Parliament

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to discuss the powers of the European Parliament with other European Economic Community Foreign Ministers.

Mr. Rifkind: This subject is one of those being considered in the Ad Hoc Committee for Institutions on which I am the United Kingdom representative. The Committee's report will be discussed at the European Council in June.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Committee on Institutional Affairs

40. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the European Economic Community Ad Hoc Committee on Institutional Affairs.

Mr. Rifkind: The interim report of this Committee, on which I am the British member, is available in the Library of the House. The committee is preparing a final report for submission to the March European Council.

Fontainebleau Agreement

43. Miss Boothroyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in implementing the Fontainebleau agreement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The enlargement negotiations with Spain and Portugal are entering their final phase. A text implementing the Fontainebleau conclusions on budget discipline has been formally adopted. The United Kingdom's 1983 refund has been paid. The two adhoc committees set up at Fontainebleau — on institutional affairs and a people's Europe — are completing their work and will report to the March European Council.

Agricultural Expenditure

44. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is the intention of the Foreign Affairs Council to meet European Economic Community Agriculture Ministers to discuss the level of agricultural spending in the forthcoming years.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There are no plans for such a meeting.

Community Budget (UK Contributions)

45. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the abatement of British contributions agreed at the Fontainebleau summit is dependent on the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The conclusions of the Fontainebleau European Council state that the correction formula for the United Kingdom will be a part of the decision to increase the VAT ceiling and that the increase will enter into force as soon as the ratification procedures are completed, and by 1 January 1986 at the latest.

Spain and Portugal

46. Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he expects any changes in the timetable for the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Rifkind: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike).

Vice-Presidents (Appointment)

47. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the criteria for appointment as a vice-president of the European Economic Community Commission.

Mr. Rifkind: Provisions for the appointment of Commission vice-presidents by common accord of the Governments of the members states are laid down in Articles 11 and 14 of the merger treaty.

Committee for a People's Europe

48. Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to make public the work of the European Economic Community's Committee for a People's Europe.

Mr. Rifkind: The interim report of the People's Europe Committee has been published and is available in the Library of the House. The committee is now working on its final report.

Community Policy

49. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further proposals he intends to place before his European Community partners for the development of Community policies.

Mr. Rifkind: Proposals, based on those set out in our paper "Europe — the Future", copies of which are available in the Library of the House, have been tabled in the ad-hoc committees set up by the European Council at Fontainebleau. They have concentrated on practical issues, including completion of the internal market, improvements in political co-operation and more efficient decision-taking.

Dublin Summit

50. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in implementing the decisions of the Dublin summit.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd).

Reimbursable Loans

51. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at which meeting of the Council of Ministers of the European Economic Community he expects the inter-governmental agreement on reimbursable loans to be considered.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No further discussion has been scheduled.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Building Societies

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many building societies were operating in 1983 and 1984; what were the average numbers of members or share accounts per building society in each year; and what was the average number of members or share accounts for (a) the top five and (b) the next 12 building societies in each year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The following table shows the numbers of registered building societies at 31 December 1983 and 1984, together with the numbers which were authorised to accept shares and deposits under the Building Societies (Authorisation) Regulations 1981. It also shows the average numbers of investing shareholders for the year 1983; figures for 1984 are not yet available.

	End 1983	End 1984

Tax Collection

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to restrict the role of the Inland Revenue in the collection of income tax, corporation tax, capital gains tax and other direct taxes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: We have no such plans.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is currently considering any changes in tne powers of enforcement of the Inland Revenue in relation to the collection of direct taxes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave on 18 May last year, at columns 270-71, to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie).

Long-term Debt

Mr. Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the extent to which the depreciation of pound sterling has affected the servicing of the United Kingdom's long-term debt.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The proceeds of public sector foreign currency loans are held as foreign currency assets in the official reserves. Provided that these assets are retained and not used for intervention, increases in the sterling value of the equivalent liabilities because of a sterling depreciation will therefore be matched by offsetting increases in the sterling value of the foreign currency assets.

Johnson Matthey Bankers (Review Committee)

Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a senior outside expert has now been appointed to the review committee which was established following the problems at Johnson Matthey Bankers.

Mr. Nigel Lawson: Yes. Mr. Deryk Vander Weyer is serving on the Committee. Mr. Vander Weyer is deputy chairman of British Telecom and former group deputy chairman of Barclays Bank.

Fringe Benefits

Sir David Price asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the basis of the assumptions made in the Autumn Statement 1984, what would be the estimated cost of raising the £8,500 a year threshold for the assessment of fringe benefits by directors and higher paid employees to offset the effects of inflation since this threshold was introduced; and what would be the new figure for 1985-86.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 22 January 1985, c. 364-65]: The earnings threshold for the assessment of benefits in kind does not apply to most directors. The threshold for employees was set at £8,500 with effect from 6 April 1979. If it were to be increased in line with forecast movements in the retail prices index since then, its level in 1985-86 would be about £13,500. The direct revenue cost of such a change is estimated at about £110 million in a full year at 1985-86 income levels.

Privatised Public Corporations

Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each of the public corporations privatised during the period 1979 to 1984, (a) the number of shareholders by size band of holding immediately after flotation and (b) the same information at each succeeding 31 December.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 December 1984, c. 357]: The information requested in part (a) of the hon. Member's question is given in the following tables. The figures do not include any Government residual shareholdings, shares held in trust for individual employees under companies' employee share ownership schemes, or any shares taken up by underwriters.

Information on the number of shareholders at subsequent times is a matter for the company concerned and is not covered in the tables. In the case of the employee buy-out of the National Freight Company, the initial allotment of shares was entirely a matter for the consortium. The sale of Jaguar was conducted by BL, and the initial allocation of shares is a matter for the company, not the Government.

Income Tax

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish information for 1984 showing for each European Economic Community country as well as the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries (a) the level of gross income in pounds sterling at which a single person becomes liable for income tax, (b) the starting rate of income tax, (c) the combined starting rate of income tax and any social security contributions and (d) separate figures on typical rates of local taxes where appropriate, together with information showing the level of income in pounds sterling at which (i) a single person, (ii) a married couple and (iii) a married couple with two children become liable to income tax at 30 per cent. on earned income in each country.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 20 December 1984, c. 325]: Information for all the EEC countries and a selection of OECD countries outside the EEC is given in the tables.

Notes:

1. All tax and social security figures used relate to the year 1984 or 1984-85 except for Belgium and France where 1983 figures, the latest available, have been used.
2. Conversions to sterling were made at the exchange rates prevailing on 15 January 1985. They may not fully reflect differences in purchasing power between sterling and the other currencies.
3. a. In the case of the married couples it is assumed that the income is wholly employment income of the husband.
   b. It is assumed that the United Kingdom employee is contracted in for national insurance.
4. a. The thresholds in tables I and II take account of personal reliefs, employment income reliefs and other standard reliefs as well as income tax reliefs for social security contributions where applicable.
   b. In table I, the combined rates of income tax and social security contributions take account of income tax relief for social security contributions, where applicable.
   c. Where local income tax is levied, typical rates have been used.
5. In Ireland, immediately above the threshold the married couple and married couple with two dependent children are liable to tax at a rate of 60 per cent. on the slice of income in excess of an exemption limit, if that is more favourable than tax computed in the normal way. The usual starting rate of 35 per cent. applies where income exceeds £5,020 in the case of a married couple and £4,770 in the case of a married couple with two dependent children.
. In Norway and Japan there are lower thresholds for the local income tax.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Spearing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the deficit in trade in manufactured goods between the United Kingdom and other members of the European Economic Community for 1984, estimated if necessary, based on quarterly figures.

Mr. Channon [pursuant to the reply, 18 January 1985, c. 259]: I have been asked to reply.

On information available to November the deficit with the rest of the European Economic Community was about £7¾ billion on the balance of payments basis. Figures for individual countries are not available on the same basis.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Legislation

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make available to interested hon. Members the report completed by officials on food legislation in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Fenner: The report produced by officials has been published in the form of a consultative document which was circulated on 19 December 1984 to interested organisations for comment. Copies of this document have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the envisaged time scale for the consultative process in connection with food legislation policy; and whether arrangements will be made for the representations from interested organisations to be published in full.

Mrs. Fenner: Comments on the consultative document on the review of food legislation have been requested by 1 June 1985. I have no plans to publish representations received by my Department.

Water Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will call for a report from each of the water authorities in England on how much of their net total revenue expenditure is spent on maintaining, improving and developing fisheries; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will seek a report from the Yorkshire water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(3) if he will seek a report from the Wessex water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(4) if he will seek a report from the South-West water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(5) if he will seek a report from the Southern water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(6) if he will seek a report from the Severn-Trent water Authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(7) if he will seek a report from the North-West water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(8) if he will seek a report from the Northumbrian water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(9) if he will seek a report from the Anglian water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report;

(10) if he will seek a report from the Thames water authority on the measures the authority is taking to maintain, improve and develop fisheries pursuant to its statutory obligations under section 28 of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975; and if he will make a statement on the substance of the report.

Mr. MacGregor: Water authorities report annually to Ministers on their expenditure and on the discharge of their statutory functions, including fisheries. These reports are laid before Parliament in October each year, and can be found in the Library of the House.

Food Sweeteners

Mr. Dykes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the next review of all sweeteners will be undertaken in accordance with the recommendations of the food additives and contaminants report on the review of sweeteners in food; and who will conduct the review.

Mr. MacGregor: In accordance with the recommendations of the Food Additives and Contaminants Committee, data on the intake of all permitted sweeteners will be collected and reviewed within the next four years. This review will be undertaken by the Food Advisory Committee (successor to the FACC) together with the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment.

Intervention Stocks (Information)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the present levels of surplus and intervention stores of food and wine in the European Economic Community in public and private storage, respectively; and what were the comparable totals around the same date in each of the previous 10 years.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 14 January 1985, c. 30]: The further information is set out in the following tables:

DEFENCE

Mr. Peter Levene

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the new chief of defence procurement, Mr. Peter Levene, will have any role in making recommendations or issuing guidelines about the privatisation of in house services in the royal dockyards.

Mr. Butler: As the chief of defence procurement, Mr. Levene will have no responsibility for the dockyards other than those I described in the reply I gave the hon. Gentleman on 9 January 1985, at column 458. Mr. Levene's advice will, however, be widely available, particularly in connection with our determination to achieve value for money.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer on 9 January, if Mr. Peter Levene, in his new position as head of defence procurement, will be responsible for issuing guidelines about evaluating tenders for contract work in naval refitting.

Mr. Butler: Tenders for all Government contracts, including contract refits, are evaluated and, if necessary, clarified according to established criteria, which include value for money and the ability of tenderers to meet the requirement and to fulfil the terms of the intended contract. Contracts are awarded according to these guidelines and in the light of all the circumstances obtaining at the time. So far as contract refit arrangements are concerned, and the responsibilities of Mr. Levene towards them, there is nothing I can add to the reply I gave the hon. Gentleman on 9 January 1985, at column 458.

NATO (Nuclear Weapons)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he has for claims that North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear weapons have deterred any attack on the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Stanley: The peace with freedom that has prevailed within the NATO area for nearly 40 years.

Vacuum Air Bomb

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a measure of the destructive capacity of a vacuum air bomb.

Mr. Butler: No. The British armed forces possess no such weapon.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many vacuum air bombs the British armed forces possess.

Mr. Butler: None.

Trident

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated cost of the Trident nuclear programme, expressed as a percentage of the current year's defence budget.

Mr. Butler: It is not our practice to relate project estimates involving expenditure over a number of years to the defence budget for a specific year. However, the cost of the Trident programme will on average account for about 3 per cent. of the defence budget over the 20-year period of its procurement.

RAF Trainer Aircraft

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the final selection of replacement trainers for the Royal Air Force is scheduled to be made.

Mr. Butler: I hope that a final decision between the options, which still include the possibility of refurbishing the Jet Provost, will be made in the spring.

RAF Pilots (Training)

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future training pattern of Royal Air Force pilots.

Mr. Lee: The content of RAF training, which is designed to produce pilots of the highest quality in their assigned roles with fast jet, multi-engined and helicopter types, remains unchanged, although we are continually seeking to refine and improve our training methods. In the current financial year, to save fuel, some management adjustment to the timing of certain courses is being made; but overall course lengths, flying hours and numbers in training are being maintained.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether changes will have to be made in the training pattern for new pilots following the cut in the Royal Air Force's fuel allowance.

Mr. Lee: I refer the right hon. Member to the answers I gave to the hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 9 January 1985 at column 459.

Multi-launch Rocket System

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any more progress with the procurement of the multi-launch rocket system for the Army.

Mr. Butler: Final contractual negotiations are being carried out in order to agree with the European consortium prices for the MLRS phase I launchers and rockets, so that a firm production order can then be placed. Development of the MLRS phase III system has begun, following the award of the development contract to an international consortium on 29 November.

Greenham Common

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the security authorities of the Greenham common air base have used, or have any plans to use, low frequency sound generators for the purpose of crowd control.

Mr. Stanley: Various electricity generators are in normal operational use at Greenham common, but they have no crowd control function and none is planned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal how many Select Committee reports have been debated on the Floor of the House and on which topics since 1979.

Mr. Biffen: Eighty-eight Select Committee reports have been the subject of substantive motions for debate. Their topics were:

The second report from the Home Affairs Committee 1979-80 on Race Relations and the "sus" law.

The second report from the Social Services Committee 1979-80 on Perinatal and Neonatal Mortality.

The fourth report from the Social Services Committee 1980-81 on Medical Education.

The report from the Select Committee on the revision of standing orders 1982-83.

The report from the Select Committee on Members' salaries 1981-82.

The report from the Select Committee on Procedure (Finance) 1982-83.

The report from the Select Committee on Procedure on Short Speeches 1983-84.

The first to fourth, eighth, ninth and eleventh to thirty-fifth reports of the Public Accounts Committee 1979-80.

The fifth, sixth, seventh and tenth reports of the Public Accounts Committee 1980-81.

The sixth to thirtieth reports of the Public Accounts Committee 1981-82.

The first to eleventh reports and first special report of the Public Accounts Committee 1982-83.

The first to ninth reports of the Public Accounts Committee 1983-84.

Other reports, while not the subject of substantive motions, have been noticed on the Order Paper as relevant to debates.

Mr. Mason asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what salaries and for what categories of staff and others servicing the Select Committees are now being paid; and what are their pension entitlements.

Mr. Beith: The grades of staff in the Department of the Clerk of the House which serve Select Committees and their salary ranges are as follows:

Grade	Salary Range £
Clerk of Committees	36,500
Principal Clerk	28,209—30,800
Deputy Principal Clerk	21,313—25,617
Senior Clerk	14,195—18,789
Assistant Clerk	7,317—12,029
Senior Executive Officer	11,782—14,444
Specialist Assistant	9,793—14,444
Chief Office Clerk	8,392—9,792
Senior Office Clerk	7,147—7,653
Personal Secretary	6,729—7,940
Office Clerk	6,542—7,045
Attendant	6,513—7,667

The House of Commons staff pensions scheme is operated by analogy with the Civil Service pension scheme. I am sending the right hon. Member a copy of the booklet setting out its provisions.

In addition, specialist advisers are paid on a per diem basis for work done, ranging from £26 pd to £80 pd. They have no pension entitlement.

Mr. Mason asked the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what numbers of staff, full-time and part-time, are serving each Select Committee; and how much it has cost since 1979 to date to maintain all the Committees, including the separate costs for all the trips abroad and within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Beith: The number of staff serving each Select Committee are as follows, but in many cases Committee work comprises less than half the duties of the staff concerned.

	Number
Agriculture	3
Defence	5
Education, Science and Arts	4
Employment	3
Energy	4
Environment	5
European Legislation	8
Foreign Affairs	4

Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration	2
Procedure	2
Public Accounts	3
Scottish Affairs	3
Social Services	4
Sound Broadcasting	2
Trade and Industry	4

Welsh Affairs	3

* Of whom 2 are part-time.

In addition, there are 10 members of staff (of whom one is part-time) the greater part of whose duties is to service Select Committees generally.

The overall cost of maintaining Select Committees is not readily identifiable. Costs, other than salary costs, which are clearly attributable to Select Committees have been given in the annual Select Committee Return since 1979.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Asian Families

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are Her Majesty's Government's strategy and plans for combating perinatal mortality and stillbirths in Asian families.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have identified as a priority the funding of research into the causes of perinatal mortality and stillbirths, and have launched the Asian mother and baby project to encourage Asian families to make early and full use of the maternity services. However, health authorities have the prime responsibility for considering what steps to take to continue the downward trend in perinatal mortality, and we would expect their local maternity services liaison committees to see that clinical reviews are carried out, so that any special factors that appear to be associated with the stillbirth and perinatal mortality rate of particular groups of mothers, including Asian mothers, can be identified. We have commended the reports of our Maternity Services Advisory Committee to health authorities as important guidance on the development of good maternity services.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the trend recorded in health circular (84) 17, "Screening for Cervical Cancer", about the effect of the population screening programme on the number of deaths in England and Wales from cervical cancer, is also the local trend in Waltham Forest; and if he will give an indication of the trend in Waltham Forest over the past 15 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number of deaths from cancer of the cervix uteri (ICD 180) in the London borough of Waltham Forest of women aged under 35 and aged 35 and over for 1969 to 1983 is shown in the table. Figures for England and Wales are also shown. Useful interpretation of the data for Waltham Forest is difficult because of the very small numbers.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what the percentage of deaths in Waltham Forest from cervical cancer of women over 35 years of age is of total cervical cancer deaths in the borough.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In the period 1969 to 1983, 98 per cent. of all deaths from cancer of the cervix uteri (ICD 180) in the London borough of Waltham Forest were of women aged 35 and over.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what the percentage of total cervical smear tests in Waltham Forest is of those taken from women aged under 35 years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect detailed local information in the form requested. The hon. Member may wish to approach Waltham Forest health authority for the information.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the percentage for Waltham Forest of cervical cancer deaths of at-risk women, according to Her Majesty's Government's screening policy guidelines, who never had a smear test.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect detailed local information of this sort centrally.

Depo Provera

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the patient leaflet which is to accompany each package of Depo Provera has yet been agreed between the licensing body and the manufacturers; which languages it is to be printed in; and whether doctors will have to order the leaflet specially for distribution in languages other than English.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The text of the patient information leaflet has been agreed by the licensing authority and the manufacturers of Depo Provera. It will be printed in the following languages: English, Hindi, Urdu, Bengali, Gujarati, Punjabi, Chinese, Turkish and Greek. Tape cassettes of the text of the leaflet will also be available. The company will send the English version of the leaflet to doctors with a reply-paid card which doctors may use to order leaflets or cassettes in foreign languages as required.

District Health Authorities (Appointments)

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement concerning his consultations with local authority associations on proposals for changes in the procedures governing the termination of local authority appointments to district health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have consulted the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of District Councils about a proposed amendment to regulations 5(3) of the NHS (Regional and District Health Authorities Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1983. This would have the effect of requiring local authorities, as is already the case with regional health authorities, to obtain the Secretary of State's consent to the early termination of an appointment to a district health authority on the grounds that its continuance is not in the interest of the Health Service. We will be advising the associations of our decision in the near future.

We are anxious to ensure that all members of district health authorities are appointed to exercise their own judgment on issues before them and do not come under undue pressure to act as mandated representatives of outside bodies.

Dental Treatment (Children)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to extend preventive dental treatment for children; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will provide fissure sealant treatment for children's teeth on the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Fissure sealants may already be provided to children under the community dental service and a joint working party drawn from our Department and the British Dental Association is currently considering their potential effectiveness in relation to the general dental services. In addition, an experimental capitation remuneration scheme for the dental treatment of children has been initiated which it is hoped will develop continuity of care and the promotion of preventive dental care.

Schoolchildren (Employment)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which local education authorities do not require schoolchildren, as a precondition for employment, to obtain a work permit from the education welfare service.

Mr. John Patten: No local education authority (LEA) requires a schoolchild, as a precondition of employment, to obtain a work permit. However, all LEAs except the Isles of Scilly operate byelaws which incorporate procedures to vet the part-time employment of children and, with the exception of Cornwall and Wiltshire, to issue employment cards to children who are working.

Central Drugs Initiative

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time taken to process applications for funding under the central drugs initiative.

Mr. John Patten: The time taken to process applications is influenced by various factors. These include the complexity of some applications, the need to seek further clarification or information, and the varying availability of funds at different points in the programme.

It is not possible to calculate the average time taken to process applications for funding and present it in a way which would be meaningful.

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide a list of drug projects funded under the central drugs initiative since the answer to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) of 10 December 1984, Official Report, column 385-86.

Mr. John Patten: A further seven projects have been allocated funds. The details are as follows:

Health Authority	Description of Project	£
North West Thames Region Victoria HA	Monitoring of young unregistered drug misusers	147,450
South East Thames Region Greenwich HA	Drug screening equipment	25,995
South West Thames Region Mid-Surry HA	Drug screening equipment	37,003
Mersey Regional Health Authority	Out-patient clinic in Liverpool for drug misusers	541,825
Voluntary Organisations
Ley Community (Oxford) Ltd	Additional accommodation for residential rehabilitation	152,872
Nucleus	Information gathering in Earls Court	69,958
West Cumbria MIND (Copeland)	Self-help group and other services for tranquilliser misusers	85,442

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners in Scotland (a) householders and (b) non-householders lost entitlement to supplementary benefit because of the increase in pension levels from 26 November 1984.

Mr. Whitney: I regret the information is not available. It is estimated that overall some 20,000 pensioners in Great Britain ceased to be entitled to supplementary benefit because retirement pensions were increased by a slightly greater percentage than supplementary pensions in November 1984.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received about his proposal to introduce a limited list for National Health Service prescriptions; and if he will put into categories the numbers making such representations.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: So far we have received almost 3,000 letters commenting on our proposals to limit the range of drugs available in certain therapeutic categories. Of those, some 900 have been sent by doctors and the remainder have come from a wide range of individuals and organisations. Over 300 of the letters from doctors have simply been circular letters supplied by the drug industry which show an imperfect understanding of our proposals.

In addition, the Chief Medical Officer has received well over 1,000 replies to his letter of 14 December 1984 to all doctors. These have contained constructive suggestions about the medicines which should remain available to meet clinical needs.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many drugs are prescribed under the National Health Service; and what percentage of the total are likely to be affected by the proposed limited list; and, of the drugs presently prescribable, what percentage of the total are proprietary drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 353]: Doctors can prescribe under the NHS from a range of around 18,000 different items. Details of the numbers of proprietary drugs are not readily available, but in England in 1983 about 82 per cent. of all prescriptions dispensed by retail chemists were for proprietary products. The proportion of proprietary drugs affected by our limited list proposals cannot be estimated until the list is finalised after consultation with the medical and pharmaceutical professions and the drugs industry. However, the therapeutic categories of drugs covered by our proposals comprise only about 10 per cent. of expenditure on drugs and only some drugs in those categories will be affected.

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) why the British Medical Association, the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry and other concerned bodies were not consulted during the course of the in-depth study into limited list and generic prescribing as outlined by the Lord Glenarthur speaking in another place on 15 January;

(2) whether he intends to publish the details of the in-depth study carried out since 1981 into generic and limited list prescribing as outlined by the Lord Glenarthur speaking in another place on 15 January.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My noble Friend Lord Glenarthur was describing in another place on 15 January the discussions that preceded and followed the production of the Greenfield report and the process by which we have kept abreast of developments worldwide in the provision of drug subsidised schemes. We made particular efforts to bring our information on international experience up to date last summer and collected detail on schemes in a number of countries. We did not produce any report in a form that could be published. There has been a large amount of debate involving the Government and members of the professions and the industry over the last two years on the subject of containing drug costs and I do not see what further consultations could have been held usefully before my right hon. Friend announced the beginning of consultation on our limited list proposed in November.

Renal Patients

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many new end-stage renal patients per million population are currently being accepted per year by each regional health authority.

Mr. John Patten: The European Dialysis and Transplant Association has provided the following provisional data in respect of 1983, the latest year for which figures are available:

Region	New patients (per million population)
Northern	42·9
Yorkshire	28·1
Trent	32·9
East Anglian	38·4
North West Thames	33·1
North East Thames	38·1
South East Thames*	36·8
South West Thames*
Wessex	24·4
Oxford	35·2
South Western	30·7
West Midlands	30·8
Mersey	28·3
North Western	30·5

* Joint provision of renal services.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ask regional health authorities to accept a target rate of 100 new end-stage renal patients per million population per year.

Mr. John Patten: We can see no possibility that the incidence of treatable end-stage renal failure in the United Kingdom would require an acceptance rate of this magnitude. Regional health authorities have recently agreed to meet a target of treating a minimum of 40 new end-stage renal failure patients per million population per year by 1987.

Regional Authorities (Rayner Report)

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received replies from each of the authority chairmen whom he asked to prepare an action programme to make the saving of about £75,000 per year estimated in the Rayner report.

Mr. John Patten: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the scrutiny of non-ambulance transport services in the National Health Service. All the regional health authorities have submitted plans and these are being assessed.

Cystic Fibrosis

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any additional assistance is to be made available to sufferers of cystic fibrosis in order to defray their costs caused by this condition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to do so. We consider that it is generally more appropriate to concentrate social security benefits for disabled people on helping all those with particular needs, rather than to single out particular types of disability.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many specialist units for cystic fibrosis sufferers exist in England and Wales; how many and which of them are within the north-west region; what advantages flow from the operation of these units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 348]: Information on units specialising in cystic fibrosis is not collected centrally, although I understand that within the north-western region consideration is being given to a regional unit for adult sufferers at Monsall hospital in north Manchester. The intensity of cystic fibrosis, and therefore its treatment, can vary, and there is some difference in medical opinion as to whether, for the majority of cases, any benefits arising from regional or other centres would outweigh the difficulties and disruption involved in treating children far from their homes. It is for health authorities, in consultation with the consultants concerned, to determine how best services for children and for older sufferers from cystic fibrosis should be organised and where they should be located.

AIDS

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any proposals to add acquired immune deficiency syndrome to the list of notifiable diseases.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider making acquired immune deficiency syndrome a notifiable disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friends to my reply to my hon. Friends the Members for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) and for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Mrs. Knight) on 21 January at column 347.

Pharmaceutical Products (Imports)

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in how many cases proceedings have been taken against companies importing pharmaceutical products without being in possession of the appropriate licence; and if he is satisfied that no unlicensed products are entering the country.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In the last 10 years, proceedings have been taken against 11 companies or individuals who, in breach of the provisions of the Medicines Act 1968, have imported a medicinal product for human use not in accordance with a product licence. Our Department cannot monitor all incoming medicinal products, and in any case it is not an offence to import from the European Community and to hold in store medicinal products licensed in a Community country.

A close watch is, however kept for alleged unlicensed medicines and all reports are followed up. Enforcement proceedings are considered if there is prima facie evidence that the terms of the Medicines Act or the European Community legislation have been breached.

District Nurses (Training)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of recruits to district nurse training courses for each of the last five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The numbers of recruits to district nurse training who have entered for the qualifying examination in England in each of the last five years are as follows:

	Number
1980	1,288
1981	1,486
1982	878
1983	885
1984	887

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate the cost in a full financial year of releasing employers from the cost of national insurance contributions for all new employees engaged; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will estimate the cost of releasing employers from the cost of national insurance contributions in a full financial year, if all those currently under 25 years of age and unemployed were employed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will estimate the cost of releasing employers from the cost of national insurance contributions in a full financial year if all those under 25 years of age who are classed as long-term unemployed were employed; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will estimate the cost of releasing employers from the cost of national insurance contributions in a full financial year if those currently unemployed between the ages of 55 and 60 years were employed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: An estimate of the contributions payable if those at present unemployed were employed could be made only on the basis of arbitrary assumptions about rates of pay, periods of employment etc. and the result would depend very much on the precise rules for waiving liability.

Social Workers

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people took the one year post-qualifying course for social work with deaf people in the last five years; and how many people are currently taking the course.

Mr. Newton: The figures for the last five years for the two full-time, one-year post qualifying courses are as follows:

	Number
1979	21
1980	—
1981	4
1982	13
1983	5

The figure for the current academic year is four.

Deaf Persons (Interpreters)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) local authorities and (b) health authorities employ interpreters for the deaf; and if he considers the present provision to be adequate.

Mr. Newton: We are not aware of any local authority or health authority which employs staff solely to act as interpreters for deaf people. However, most local authorities employ staff with interpreting skills and as part of their wider responsibilities nearly all social services departments are able to provide an interpreter service for the deaf, either direct or through an agency. Provision generally needs to be improved and in this connection the Department is providing grant aid to organisations such as the Council for the Advancement of Communication with Deaf People.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost to public funds of (a) reducing the retirement age for men, but paying full pension, to 64 years as from 1 September 1985 and (b) reducing it to 60 years, by 1990, assuming increases in pension rates between November 1985 and November 1990 to match the rate of inflation.

Mr. Whitney: The latest available estimates of the cost of reducing pension age are contained in the third report from the Social Services Committee on the "Age of Retirement" (HC26: 1982). These estimates indicate that the cost of reducing the pension age for men to 64 would be £400 million at 1981-82 benefit levels. The cost of reducing the pension age for men to 60 is estimated at £2,500 million, also at 1981-82 benefit rates. An estimate for a phased reduction pension age for men to age 60 by 1990 is not available in the form requested. The estimates provided for the Social Services Committee are at present being updated.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mrs. Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest position on the strike at his Department's Newcastle central office and its effect on the payment of pensions and benefits.

Mr. Newton: The computer staff who were on strike at the Department's Newcastle central office have this week returned to duty. The following is the latest position on the payment of benefits, including retirement pensions, widows benefit and child benefit.

RETIREMENT PENSIONS AND WIDOWS' BENEFIT

Paid by Order Book

About 7 million retirement pensioners and widows are currently obtaining payments from post offices on the stubs of expired order books. The issue of new order books to these pensioners will begin shortly but will not be completed until June. Stub payments will continue in the meantime. Pensioners who have missed any stub payments will be paid for the missed weeks by the post office when they are given their new book.

Paid by Payable Order

From the end of January Newcastle central office will resume payment by payable order to all pensioners in Great Britain normally paid by that method. Pensioners living overseas are already being paid by payable order from Newcastle.

Paid by Credit Transfer

Payment of pensions by credit transfer is already operating normally.

New Pensioners

Responsibility for issuing payments to new pensioners who claimed their pension during the strike is being transferred to Newcastle central office, but it will be several months before this is completed. Payment from local social security offices will continue in the meantime.

CHILD BENEFIT

Payment arrangements for child benefit should be back to normal for most beneficiaries by early February. Stub payments will, however, continue until March for some beneficiaries whose circumstances have recently changed.

UNEMPLOYMENT, SICKNESS AND INVALIDITY BENEFIT

It will take about two months to bring all contribution records up to date so the emergency arrangements for determining entitlement to unemployment, sickness and invalidity benefits will continue until April.

Hospitals (Statistics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each year since 1970 the number of National Health Service hospitals in each region.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 512]: The requested information is given in the table.

* Figures are based on a count of hospitals which provided residential facilities during a year. Day hospitals and clinics are therefore not included.

† Figures prior to 1974 relate to regional hospital boards and thereafter to regional health authorities. Because of NHS restructuring in 1974 and 1982 the regional figures are not strictly comparable over the whole period.

Residential Homes

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how much money has been spent by his Department on residential homes in each year since 1979 up to the latest figures available (a) nationally, (b) in the Tyne and Wear county area and (c) in the South Tyneside district area;

(2) what is the total amount of money spent by his Department on personal social services in each year since 1979 up to the latest available figures.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1985, c. 166]: Two columns of figures in the table were inadverantly transposed. The correct information is as follows:

Net current expenditure by local authorities on the personal social services:

(£ million Cash)

	England		Tyne and Wear Residential Homes	South Tyneside Residential Homes
	All Personal Social Services	Residenual Homes

Notes:

1. 1983-84 England figures are provisional.
2. The main client groups covered by the residential homes figures are the elderly, children, younger physically disabled, mentally handicapped and mentally ill.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) ambulance, (b) ambulance depots and (c) ambulance drivers were employed by the Northern regional health authority for each year between 1979 and 1984.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1985, c. 171]: The numbers of ambulancemen/women working in the Northern regional health authority in the years 1979 to 1983 are given in the table. The information for September 1984 is not yet available. The numbers of ambulancemen/women directly employed by the RHA, in the Northumbria ambulance service, are also shown for they years 1981 to 1983 only, the earlier years not being available.

NHS (Waiting Lists)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures for the number of patients on National Health Service waiting lists in the areas covered by (a) the Northumbria regional health authority and (b) the South Tyneside area health authority; and how these figures compare with the figures for each year since 1979-80.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 16 January 1985, c. 169]: The requested information is given in the table. In general, figures on waiting lists are believed to include a significant proportion of duplicated entries and patients who no longer require treatment. The amount of overstatement cannot readily be estimated, but is thought to exceed 10 per cent. nationally and could be considerably more. About half of all admissions to hospital are immediate, and many of those on waiting lists already have a planned date of admission.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a list of family practitioner committees and the district health authorities to which they each relate.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 17 January 1985, c. 225]: The existing 90 family practitioner committees in England and the district health authority or authorities which established or adopted them are set out in the table. The list does not include details of the agency arrangements which are currently operated by certain FPCs and DHAs.

On 1 April 1985 the 90 FPCs will be replaced by an equal number, established to act for specified localities. An order, establishing 75 of the new English FPCs and specifying their localities, was laid before Parliament on 2 January. The remaining 15 will be the subject of a further order to be made shortly.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Support

Mr. Tracey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is now able to set out the timescale and terms of reference for the review of the student support system.

Sir Keith Joseph: The terms of reference of the review are to examine financial support for students in higher education. The review will concentrate on support at first degree and sub-degree levels. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and I, in association with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, will issue a consultative paper as soon as practicable. After an appropriate period of consultation, the Government will decide on any changes which it may wish to introduce and will publish proposals accordingly.

Dyslexic Children

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria his Department recommends to local education authorities to use to identify dyslexic children.

Mr. Dunn: The duty of local education authorities under the Education Act 1981 is not to categorise children, but to assess their individual special educational needs and to ensure that those needs are met. So far as children with specific reading difficulties are concerned, the advice given in the report of the Secretary of State's advisory committee is still valid.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now instruct his Department to collect information on children with dyslexia, both in mainstream and special schools.

Mr. Dunn: No. The Education Act 1981 deliberately seeks to avoid categorising children.

Reading Ability

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) which local education authorities have compulsory testing of reading ability at seven years of age;

(2) if he will list each local education authority's median reading quotient for the years 1980 to 1984.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected centrally.

Advanced Further Education

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in the Official Report the 1985-86 prescribed capital expenditure under section 72 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 for equipment for teaching and research in advanced further education for each local education authority in England expressed as a percentage of the 1985-86 national advisory body target student for each such local education authority.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend announced on 10 January at column 526 that the allocations to local education authorities in England for prescribed capital expenditure in 1985-86 provided for authorities' bids for equipment related to teaching and research within further and higher education to be met in full. The following table shows for every local education authority whose bid distinguished advanced further education, the allocation for equipment for teaching and research in AFE, the national advisory body's target student numbers for 1985-86 (expressed in full-time equivalent terms), and hence the allocation per student. No attempt has been made to weight the student numbers to take account of the relatively high cost of equipment in scientific disciplines.

Medical Research Council (Budget)

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate the actual amounts and the proportion of the total Medical Research Council budget allocated to research projects in Oxford, Cambridge and London for each of the years (a) 1978-79, (b) 1979-80, (c) 1980-81, (d) 1981-82, (e) 1982-83 and (f) 1983-84.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the Medical Research Council estimates that its research expenditure in each of the three locations mentioned is as follows:

Financial Year	Oxford		Cambridge		London
	£000	Per cent. of budget	£000	Per cent. of budget	£000	Per cent. of budget
1980-81	4,326	4·6	10,579	11·4	27,461	29·5
1981-82	4,646	4·4	12,650	11·9	33,308	31·2
1982-83	4,847	4·3	13,385	11·8	35,691	31·6
1983-84	5,566	4·6	14,210	11·9	37,662	31·4

No figures are available prior to 1980-81.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will indicate for each of the years (a) 1978-79, (b) 1979-80, (c) 1980-81, (d) 1981-82, (e) 1982-83 and (f) 1984, the proportion of the total Medical Research Council budget devoted to clinical rather than laboratory research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the Medical Research Council regards clinical research as research requiring direct access to patients—though some of the research itself may take place in laboratories. The proportion of its own budgets devoted to such work between 1980-81 and 1982-83 is estimated to be as follows:

Financial Year	Percentage of MRC total budget
1980-81	23·2
1981-82	23·2
1982-83	23·9

No figures are available prior to 1980-81 or for 1983-84.

I would also refer the hon. Member to my answer on 17 January to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) at col. 226.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police (Computers)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he measures the value for money obtained by the increased use of computers by police forces.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to his question on 29 November at column 541. It is for police authorities to satisfy them-selves that expenditure on police computers represents good value for money. Moreover, my right hon. and learned Friend is encouraging chief officers to evaluate operational systems and to ensure that new systems are installed only after careful consideration of objectives, options and costs. As explained, the Department will shortly be issuing further guidance to chief officers of police and police authorities on the considerations to be taken into account in order to ensure that value for money is obtained.

Fine Defaulters

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of (a) men and (b) women at present serving sentences in London prisons for the non-payment of fines.

Mr. Mellor: It is estimated from central records that on 30 November 1984 in the region of 100 male and 10 female fine defaulters aged 21 and over were held in prison department establishments in Greater London—that is, Brixton, Feltham, Holloway, Latchmere House, Pentonville, Wandsworth and Wormwood Scrubs.

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women served prison sentences in London prisons for the non-payment of fines in the last three years.

Mr. Mellor: The information available from central records is given in the following table:

Persons aged 21 and over initially received into prisons in Greater London on committal in default of payment of a fine† by sex and year of reception*

	Males	Females
1982	3,800	290
1983	3,660	350
‡1984	2,200	390

* Brixton, Feltham, Holloway, Latchmere House, Pentonville, Wandsworth and Wormwood Scrubs.

† Including those in default of payment of a compensation order or costs.

‡ January to October, provisional.

Detained Persons (Code of Practice)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will amend the code of practice for the detention, treatment and questioning of persons by the police by prescribing a minimum period of rest between questioning by the police and subsequent court appearance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The draft code of practice on the detention, treatment and questioning of persons by the police, which my right hon. and learned Friend published as a consultative document on 10 January, contains detailed provisions governing the periods of rest which detained persons must be permitted free from questioning or other interruptions arising from the investigation—as well as other aspects of detention, such as the provision of meals, exercise and toilet and washing facilities. We do not believe that it would be in the interests of detained persons to provide for a break between the completion of questioning and court appearance, the effect of which could well be to delay the time of release from custody. Nevertheless, all responses to the consultation document will be considered carefully.

Non-violent Crime (Punishment)

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration he is giving to other means of punishment for non-violent criminals to that of long custodial sentences.

Mr. Mellor: The Criminal Justice Act 1982 re-enacted and strengthened the powers available to the courts when making probation orders — or supervision orders on juvenile offenders—and provided for the introduction of community service orders for 16-year-olds. My right hon. and learned Friend has reduced from one year to six months the minimum qualifying period of custody before a prisoner can be considered for parole. We shall keep under review the range of alternatives to custody, including means by which reparation between the offender and the victim might be arranged. We intend also to introduce legislation during this Parliament to give the courts more effective powers to deprive offenders of the proceeds of crime.

Violent Crime (Punishment)

Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider recommending even more severe punishment for violent offenders.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend fully supports the proposals in the Bill now before the House, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), to increase the maximum penalties for attempted rape and for indecent assault. It is also intended to introduce legislation during this Parliament to increase to life imprisonment the maximum penalty for carrying firearms in furtherance of crime. Otherwise, my right hon. and learned Friend is satisfied that the courts have sufficient powers to deal with violent offenders. The exercise of these powers in individual cases is entirely a matter for the courts.

Crime Prevention Programmes

Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to fund crime prevention programmes.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None. Funding for crime prevention programmes is available through the urban programme.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the total cost to date to public funds of policing the miners' strike.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Information on the total costs of policing the dispute is not available. The Home Office has so far paid to police authorities in England and Wales advances of police grant and of the special payment which my right hon. and learned Friend is making available on expenditure totalling some £145 million.

Departmental Review (Farrell and Others)

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why his Department's review into the case of Farrell and others has taken so long;

(2) what is the specific issue the police are investigating in connection with his Department's review of the case of Farrell and others;

(3) if he will consider asking a police force other than the Metropolitan police to investigate the case of Farrell and others in connection with his Department's current review.

Mr. Mellor: The review of the case which my right hon. and learned Friend ordered has involved inquiries by the Metropolitan police into a number of aspects, but with particular reference to the allegations of interference with a video tape recording. Most of these inquiries have now been completed and the results so far received are being considered. Once we have all the results, the review will be completed as quickly as possible. My right hon. and learned Friend can see no present reason to involve any other police force in the review.

Mr. James Magis

Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 15, whether Mr. James Magis was removed specifically to France at his own request or on the direction of his Department; and what were the basic grounds for his decision that the exclusion of Mr. Magis would be conducive to the public good.

Mr. Brittan: Mr. Magis was returned to France, the country from which he had arrived, on 5 December 1984 under powers conferred by the Immigration Act 1971, having been refused leave to enter the United Kingdom on my personal direction that his exclusion would be conducive to the public good for reasons of national security.

Colin Evans (Report)

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a report from the Berkshire probation committee about Colin Evans; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I have received a report from the Berkshire probation committee about the involvement of the Berkshire probation service with Colin Evans and am placing a copy in the Library of the House. The report sets out the history of the case and explains the circumstances in which Colin Evans' probation officer, Mr. P. G. Southerton, was disciplined by the chief probation officer in August 1982.

In the light of the report from the Berkshire probation committee, the Home Office is reminding chief probation officers that it is the duty of all probation officers, when dealing with child sex offenders, to take every step to prevent their having contact with children. In addition, as I announced on 19 December, a review is in hand of the arrangements whereby information about the criminal background of those who seek to do any work, paid or unpaid, with children is made availble to those who need to know it.

TRANSPORT

Driving Tests

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average waiting period for a driving test in each of the test centres within the area of the west midlands county; and how these figures compare with the average for 1983, 1982, 1981 and the average waiting period for England and Wales.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

West Midlands Metropolitan County

Driving test centre	Waiting times (weeks)

More driving examiners are being recruited to reduce these generally excessive waiting periods. Examiners are also transferred temporarily between centres to help reduce the longest waits. The effects are already becoming apparent at a number of centres.

Greater Manchester (Highway Functions)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport which specific highway functions are duplicated in practice between the metropolitan county and the district councils in the Greater Manchester area; and if he will give an estimate of the number of staff who are involved in such duplicated work.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that both the metropolitan county councils and the district councils have highway departments engaged in the improvement and maintenance of metropolitan county roads. Managerial decisions to be taken by the successor authorities to the metropolitan county councils will reveal to what extent this duplication serves any purpose.

Junction Crossing (Thatched House, Leytonstone High Road)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received for a pedestrian phase to the junction crossing at the Thatched House, Leytonstone high road; and when approval from his Department is likely to be forthcoming.

Mrs. Chalker: A variety of suggestions have been received from the GLC, the London borough of Waltham Forest, the Cann Hall Residents Association and the Leyton and Leytonstone Liberals about ways of improving conditions for pedestrians at this junction, having regard to the needs of traffic.

I hope to be able to decide quite soon on the most appropriate measures for easing this local problem.

Sea Circle Sculpture, Liverpool

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport why transport supplementary grant approval was given for the construction of the Sea Circle sculpture in Seymour street, Liverpool, by his Department; if he will list other similar projects which his Department has sanctioned; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Transport supplementary grant—TSG—approval was not given by my Department for the construction of this sculpture, nor for any similar projects. TSG is a block grant to county councils and the GLC, and they decide precisely how it is to be spent. However, Parliament approved changes in the TSG system last November which concentrate the grant on capital expenditure on highways and traffic management. As in previous years, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport names road schemes for which he is making grant available, and takes account of their progress in each following settlement.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many fatalities have been caused by collision with road signs, in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Chalker: Statistics on the causes of road accidents are not collected by the Department. However, fatalities associated with vehicles which hit road signs or traffic signals in 1983, the latest complete available year, were as follows:

	Numbers
Vehicle drivers	50
Vehicle passengers	20
Pedestrians	8

Buses

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has made of the impact of implementation of the buses White Paper on those people who have been issued life bus passes as part of their pensions.

Mr. Ridley: On the basis of available information, I do not foresee any problems which cannot be resolved.

Train Accident (Rugby)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will publish the findings of the British Rail inquiry into the accident which took place on 9 December 1984 at Rugby; and what action has been taken to prevent a recurrence of the accident involving two trains colliding on the same line;

(2) if any disciplinary action has been taken resulting from the inquiry by British Rail into the train accident that occurred on 9 December 1984 at Rugby;

(3) if he will order a public inquiry into the rail accident that took place on 9 December at Rugby; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The accident occurred when a British Rail engineers' train was propelled past a signal at danger on to the main line and into the path of an approaching passenger train. The driver of the passenger train was able to slow down and the collison occurred at low speed. Two passengers received minor injuries. Full details of the accident were reported to the Railway Inspectorate. Since the cause was clearly established and BR was taking the necessary action to prevent a recurrence, no formal inquiry was ordered. I have no powers to require publication of BR's internal inquiries, but a summary of the circumstances of the accident and the action taken by the board will be given in the Chief Inspecting Officer's annual report for 1984. We understant that BR has taken disciplinary action against the members of its staff held responsible for the accident.

Departmental Property

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve and upgrade property owned by his Department on Archway road, London N6.

Mrs. Chalker: The findings of the district valuer, who has been examining the condition of the Department's properties, are being considered.

Highway Maintenance Service

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the total savings he expects to make in the event of the abolition of the six metropolitan county councils on the highway maintenance service; and by what means these are to be achieved.

Mrs. Chalker: Many metropolitan districts already maintain metropolitan county council roads as agents. The extent of savings in each case depends upon the degree of duplication in the present arrangements and upon managerial decisions to be taken by the successor authorities.

Foreign Driving Licences (Exchanges)

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will now announce the result of the consultations on exchange of further foreign driving licences.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Following consultation with representative organisations, my right hon. Friend has made an order under the Road Traffic (Driving Licences) Act 1983 designating the following countries and territory: Barbados, the Republic of Cyprus, Finland, Malta, Zimbabwe, and the British Virgin Islands.

New residents in Great Britain who hold currently valid licences issued in any of these places can apply to exchange them for ordinary driving licences with effect from 2 February 1985. The application must be made within the first year of residence, surrendering a currently valid exchangeable licence.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Corporation

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 11 January, Official Report, column 558, what is the estimated effect of value added tax on Housing Corporation finances; and if this is paid from gross capital resources.

Mr. Gow: In 1984-85 value added tax is expected to account for £30 million of the Housing Corporation's gross expenditure. The current estimate for 1985-86, on the same basis, is £34 million.

Smokeless Zones

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of smokeless zones which have been (a) suspended or (b) repealed, respectively, in the period November 1984 to date, and in each of the corresponding periods for the preceding two winters.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since November 1984, smoke control restrictions have been temporarily suspended in five local authority areas: Reading, Preston, north Warwickshire, Guildford and Portsmouth. No suspension orders were made during the corresponding periods for the previous two years. There have been no permanent repeals of smoke control restrictions, although, for administrative reasons, specific orders are occasionally repealed and immediately replaced by new ones.

Inter-Action (Payments)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums have been paid by the London Docklands Development Corporation to the body known as Inter-Action; for what services; what applications have been received from the corporation in respect of further payments to this body; for what amount; for what purposes; and over what contractual period.

Sir George Young: Inter-Action was appointed by the London Docklands Development Corporation on 1 August 1984 for £10,000 per month short-term consultancy agreement to provide advice on community matters. The Department is currently considering an application from the corporation to provide Inter-Action with £1·024 million over a three-year period to cover the transfer of its base to the royal docks and establishment there of training, job creation and recreation programmes for local people and a general consultancy role on community issues.

Flats (Planning Permission)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the Government will now introduce legislation to relieve local planning authorities of their liability to pay compensation for the refusal of planning permission for the addition of new flats to a block of flats built before July 1948: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane We have today introduced the Town and Country Planning (Compensation) Bill to modify rights to compensation under sections 165 and 169 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and the equivalent Scottish provisions. The amendment to section 169 will secure that compensation will no longer be payable for the refusal or conditional grant of permission on applications made on or after today's date which relate to the addition of new flats to a block which was in existence on July 1948. The amendment to section 165 will limit the right to compensation for the refusal or conditional grant of planning permission for development following withdrawal of permission by the amendment or revocation of a development order. In such cases compensation will be payable only where an application is made within 12 months of the withdrawal or, where the withdrawal has already taken place, within 12 months of the Bill receiving Royal Assent.

WALES

Home Insulation Grants

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Wales what increase has been made in the provision for home insulation grants in Wales contained in the total local authority housing capital allocations for 1985-86 to take account of the first full year of the operation of the topping-up grants for loft insulation under the homes insulation grant scheme.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In allocating resources for expenditure under the homes insulation scheme 1985-86 we have continued to meet district councils' bids in full.

Health Authorities (Transport Costs)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for each district health authority in Wales the amount of money, within his Department's total grant to that authority, which is provided to meet the transport and travelling needs of that authority in the current financial year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is for individual health authorities to decide the level of resource allocation to meet transport and travelling needs within the resources available to them. Information on these decisions for the current financial year is not held centrally.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the full-time employees of his Department are men and how many are women; and whether he has any proposals to increase career opportunities for women within his Department.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Of my Department's 2,167 full-time employees, 1,169 are men and 998 are women. The programme of action on equal opportunities, recommended by the joint review group set up by the Civil Service National Whitley Council's joint personnel management committee, will increase career opportunities for women and is being implemented by my Department.

Ambulances

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many ambulances in working condition there are in each of the district health authorities in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number varies from day to day, and is not held centrally.

A55 (Rock Fall)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set up an investigation into the causes of the landslide that blocked the A55 trunk road between Llanfairfechan and Penmaenmawr, in Gwynedd, with particular reference to any part in the triggering of the landslide that may have been played by test drilling undertaken in the area recently.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: There is no evidence or reason to believe that there is a connection between this incident and the test drilling of rocks undertaken as part of the site investigation in the vicinity of Pen-y-Clip for the proposed new A55 road tunnel.

Generally rock falls or slips in such areas can be attributed to gradual erosion and cumulative weathering effects. It is considered that this is the most likely cause here.

As part of the investigations into the construction of the proposed road tunnels at Pen-y-Clip and Penmaenbach, the Department is to seek landowner's consent to the carrying out of a careful examination of the rock faces bordering the present trunk road to identify, and render safe, any rocks which experts consider could be loosened by the effects of blasting operations whilst the works are in progress.

Community Health Specialists

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will issue general guidelines to district health authorities in Wales in order to ensure that community health specialists employed by health authorities in Wales have the right to speak freely in public and voice their own opinions on matters that are of concern to the public in the area where they work.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. Public statements by doctors employed as specialists in community medicine are covered by their terms and conditions of service.

Co-operative Enterprises

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's contributions to the development of co-operative enterprises in Wales since 1979.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Government have introduced a large variety of measures to help small businesses, most of which are of help to co-operatives. Advice and guidance is offered to co-operatives through the Welsh Office small firms information centre and the Welsh Development Agency's and Development Board for Rural Wales' advisory services. My right hon. Friend has given additional support in Wales under the urban programme to projects promoting co-operatives and agreed in 1983 a three-year grant to the Wales Co-operative Development and Training Centre.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Criminal Proceedings

Mr. Cohen asked the Attorney-General, further to his answer of 30 November 1984, Official Report, column 599, to the hon. Member for Leyton, if any identification processes were undertaken or any medical or forensic evidence sought or obtained by the police in the case of the alleged rape case.

The Solicitor-General: The complainant was medically examined by a police surgeon. Items taken from and specimens provided by both the complainant and the accused were submitted for examination by forensic scientists. The case involved no issue as to identity and accordingly no identification parades were held.

Mr. Cohen asked the Attorney-General, further to his answer of 30 November 1984, Official Report, column 599, to the hon. Member for Leyton, if the alleged victim of the rape attack made a statement to the police.

The Solicitor-General: Yes; but following her death the rules of evidence rendered it inadmissible against the defendant.

Mr. John Grant

Mr. Cohen asked the Attorney-General if he will place in the Library a summary of the report from the Sussex police which led to the Director of Public Prosecutions' decision to drop the extradition warrant against Mr. John Grant; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No. Reports submitted by chief officers of police for the Director of Public Prosecutions for the purpose of obtaining advice in relation to criminal matters are confidential and cannot be disclosed.

ENERGY

Gas and Electricity Boards (Payments)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what amount of money has been paid to the Government by the gas and electricity boards, respectively, in each year since 1979.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Moneys paid to the Government by each industry were as follows:

British Gas Corporation

Financial Year	Corporation Tax £ million	Gas levy £ million	Net Repayment of Government Loans £ million
1979-80	—	—	109
1980-81	—	—	—
1981-82	154	383	—
1982-83	196	471	—
1983-84	234	522	—

Electricity Industry in England and Wales

Financial Year	Net Repayment of Government Loans £ million	Interest payments on outstanding loans less discount £ million
1979-80	(−)837	274
1980-81	(−)296	412
1981-82	449	464
1982-83	(−)25	387
1983-84	857	379

(−) Negative repayments represent additional borrowing.

Standing Charge Rebate Scheme

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people benefited from the standing charges rebate scheme in each year since 1979.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Standing charge rebate schemes were introduced by British Gas from February 1983 and by area electricity boards from January and February 1983. In 1983-84, the first full year of their operation, the schemes are estimated to have benefited some 3 million gas and some 2 million electricity consumers.

Fuel Standing Charges

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the cost of abolishing fuel standing charges for pensioners.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is estimated that the total cost of abolishing electricity and gas standing charges for pensioners would be some £300 million a year.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Malta

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance has been provided by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Malta for the promotion of its tourist industry following the closure of the British naval base on the island.

Mr. Raison: None.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committees

Mr. Mason asked the Lord Privy Seal how many reports have been issued by the Select Committees since 1979, giving titles of each report from the separate Select Committees.

Mr. Biffen: Four hundred and twenty-seven reports and 103 special reports have been made by select committees since 1979. I shall be in touch with the right hon. Member about the titles of each report.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Youth Training Scheme

Miss Maynard asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the figure for the numbers of farmers' daughters and sons who have completed the youth training scheme under the monitoring of the northern regional department of the agricultural training board; and if he will express this number as a percentage of those monitored by the agricultural training board from its Harrogate office.

Mrs. Fenner: Neither the Manpower Services Commission, which is responsible for the youth training scheme, nor the agricultural training board, which keeps a check on the on-farm training, compile such information.

Butter

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any butter has been withdrawn from the privately-owned stores for the purpose of the European Economic Community Christmas butter sale at reduced prices.

Mr. MacGregor: Of the 200,000 tonnes of butter which is being sold at a reduced price in the European Economic Community, 27,000 tonnes may be drawn from private storage stocks and sold in the countries where it was stocked. In addition, some of the butter sold in Italy and Greece under these arrangements may have been drawn from private storage stock in other countries. The United Kingdom allocation of 39,200 tonnes is being provided entirely from butter which has been sold into intervention in this country.

Live Animals (Export)

Mr. Hunter asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the current regulations controlling the export of live animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Council directives 77/489/EEC and 81/389/EEC, implemented in this country by the Export of Animals (Protection) Order 1981, provide a satisfactory framework for the protection of exported farm animals. My officials are in constant contact with other member states and with the EC Commission on this subject.

Dairy Imports (New Zealand)

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate of the total volume of dairy products which will be imported from New Zealand in the current year; and if he will estimate the equivalent volume of milk which this represents.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom is authorised to import on special terms 81,000 tonnes of butter from New Zealand in 1985. In addition, New Zealand may export 9,500 tonnes of cheese to the European Economic Community on special terms, most of which will come to the United Kingdom. It is expected that New Zealand will make full use of these arrangements. These quantities are approximately equivalent to the butterfat content of 1·7 million tonnes of milk and the solids-not-fat content of 43,000 tonnes of milk.

Gas Prices (Holland)

Mr. Lyell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make representations to the European Commission for it to initiate and prosecute urgently proceedings against the Dutch Government under article 93.2 of the Treaty of Rome in relation to the granting of preferential gas prices to Dutch growers.

Mr. MacGregor: We have already made repeated forceful representations to the effect that the Commission should take all possible steps provided for under article 93(2) to resolve this matter.

Cheddar Cheese

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the total volume of (a) production, (b) home sales, (c) imports and (d) exports of Cheddar cheese over the past five years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested is as follows:

Thousand tonnes

United Kingdom	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984†
Production	162·1	162·7	168·4	159·8	160·9	148·8

* Data on home sales are not available and offtake (production plus imports less exports and stock changes) which represents supplies moving into consumption has been used as a proxy.

† January to November.

Sweeteners

Mr. Mark Hughes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the Food Additives and Contaminants Committee is likely to undertake a further review of the safety of intense sweeteners, particularly in carbonated soft drinks.

Mr. Jopling: The safety of permitted food additives is kept under continuous review. In accordance with the recommendations in the Food Additives and contaminants Committee's report on the review of sweeteners in food, data on the intake of all permitted sweeteners will be collected and reviewed within the next few years by the Food Advisory Committee (successor to the FACC) together with the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment.

Soya Beans

Mr. Gregory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what quantities of soya beans were grown in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years; what experiments are taking place to increase such production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I am not aware of any commecial production of soya beans in the United Kingdom in the last five years although there have been small scale commercial trials. The United Kingdom has participated in trials organised by a working group of the Food and Agriculture Organisation which have included trials on two sites in the United Kingdom over the last three years. These have indicated that, with the genetic material at present available, it remains very doubtful whether conditions in the United Kingdom are suitable for the commercial production of soya beans.

Cane Sugar Refining Industry

Dr. Godman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he has had about the effects of the possible enlargement of the European Community on the United Kingdom cane sugar refining industry.

Mr. MacGregor: My Department has regularly consulted the sugar industry on current issues, including the possible effects of the enlargement of the European Community on our refining industry.

Northumberland Coast (Salmon Netting)

Mr. Soames asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ban the netting of salmon off the coast of Northumberland.

Mr. MacGregor: The future of the English north-east coast salmon fishery was discussed in our 1981 consultation paper on the review of inland and coastal fisheries in England and Wales. In that paper we said that this fishery should neither be closed nor phased out and no evidence has since been produced to cause us to modify that view. However, last year officials were asked to carry out a further examination of the effects of the fishery and on the basis of that examination I and my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State at the Scottish Office are reviewing the management arrangements. We shall announce our conclusions when we have completed our review.

EMPLOYMENT

Asbestos

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Employment what role monitoring of organisations to which licences have been issued under the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 plays in the maintenance of safety in asbestos stripping operations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Licensees required to notify contracts have been advising enforcement authorities of their jobs in advance.

The majority of visits by enforcement authorities are made before the work of asbestos removal starts, which meets the intention behind the requirement for 28 days' notification. Inspectors can them satisfy themselves that the work will be done in accordance with the approved code of practice and guidance note on work with asbestos insulation and asbestos coating.

Some visits are made during the stripping work. Inspectors can then check whether the approved code is being observed during the work. I am advised by the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission that this allows the enforcing authorities to identify those licensees who work well, and those who do not. The hon. Member will be aware of recent publicity following a prosecution in the Warrington area; other prosecutions have taken place.

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Employment why a requirement to notify the Health and Safety Executive prior to asbestos removal operations was imposed by a majority of the licences issued under the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ensure that the Health and Safety Executive is aware of those contractors who carry out work with asbestos insulation, the condition of prior notification is included on most licences. This is in accordance with the recommendations in the first report of the advisory committee on asbestos, "Asbestos: work on thermal and acoustic insulation and sprayed coatings".

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many enforcement notices have been issued against asbestos removal organisations for each of the Health and Safety Executive's 21 areas up to 31 October 1984 following site visits made to asbestos removal operations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 came into effect on 1 August 1984. From that date, until 31 October 1984, the number of enforcement notices issued, by HSE areas, is as follows:

	Number
Area 03: South-East	15
Area 05: London North-East	1
Area 06: London South	2
Area 08: Northern Home Counties	6
Area 09: East Midlands	1
Area 14: South Yorkshire and Humberside	3
Area 16: Greater Manchester	5
Area 17: Merseyside	1
Area 18: North-West	1
Area 19: North-East	5
Area 20: Scotland East	15

No enforcement notices have been issued in the remaining 10 areas.

Mr. Michie asked the Secretary of State for Employment why, for the period up to 31 December 1984, the proportion of asbestos removal jobs notified to Health and Safety Executive area offices as a result of requirements imposed on removal organisations by licences issued under the Asbestos (Licensing) Regulations 1983 which have received site visits varies as between 4·8 per cent. in Health and Safety Executive area 2, 8·6 per cent. in area 3, 12·8 per cent. in area 7, 35·8 per cent. in area 15, 59·4 per cent. in area 12 and 72·3 per cent. in area 20.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Figures are available only up to 31 October 1984. Variations in response to notifications are the result of several factors. Many of the contracts notified were of very short duration, and of low risk, so that a visit by an inspector was not needed.

In some areas many notifications came from a small number of contractors who were well known to inspectors. This meant that relatively few visits were necessary to deal with a large number of notifications. In one area, for example, seven licensees sent in about two thirds of the notifications. Some unnecessary notifications were sent by contractors during the early period of operation of the new procedures and these did not merit investigation.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark) will be replying to the last letter the hon. Member for Walsall, North wrote to him regarding answering parliamentary questions on unemployment statistics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I replied to the hon. Member's letter yesterday.

PRIME MINISTER

Unemployment

Q9. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister what assessment was made by the Ministers at the Fontainebleau summit of the impact on unemployment of the increase in public expenditure which will stem from their decisions on own resources.

The Prime Minister: The Fontainebleau and Dublin European Councils agreed rules on budgetary discipline to restrict the future growth of the Community budget in line with the Member States' economic capacity to finance it. The new abatement system will also substantially reduce the United Kingdom's net contributions below what they would otherwise have been and keep our VAT rate below 1 per cent. The agreements are thus fully consistent with the Government's policy for improving economic growth and job prospects by better control of public expenditure.

Norwich

Q14. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit the city of Norwich during 1985.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Economic Policy (Departmental Co-ordination)

Q49. Mr. Dykes asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination between Government Departments in the promotion of policies designed to secure economic growth and a reduction in unemployment.

The Prime Minister: There is always room for improvement.

Manchester International Airport

Q56. Mr. Favell asked the Prime Minister if she plans to visit Manchester international airport.

The Prime Minister I have at present no plans to do so.

Ministerial Decisions

Q85. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister if she will instruct Ministers, when informing hon. and right hon. Members that a decision on a particular matter is to be taken shortly, to give also a more precise indication of the time scale within which an announcement may be expected.

The Prime Minister: Ministers endeavour to be as helpful as possible and I hope that where it is clear that a decision can be taken within a particular period, Members are so informed. But time scales are not always precise enough for this to be practicable.

Merseyside (Government Expenditure)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Prime Minister if she will bring up to date the figures about Government expenditure on Merseyside contained in her letter to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West of 16 March 1984 and publish the same in the Official Report.

The Prime Minister: Figures for expenditure in Merseyside by Government Departments and other public bodies for the years 1979-80 to 1984-85 (estimated outturn) are as follows:

Government Expenditure in Merseyside exclude such items.

† Grant (offers made) to support capital investment by companies in the Merseyside area, defined as the travel-to-work areas of Birkenhead (including Ellesmere Port and Halton), Liverpool, Widnes, St. Helens and Southport; and expenditure by the English Industrial Estates Corporation in the Merseyside area.

‖ Figures relate to Corporation's Merseyside Region. Figures for 1979-80 to 1981-82 are estimates.
¶ About two-thirds of grants are on local authority projects.
●Merseyside Metropolitan County Council, plus District Councils within the County (Knowsley, Liverpool, St. Helens, Sefton and Wirral). The Rate Support Grant system changed in 1981/82. Figures for earlier years are not on a comparable basis. The figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 comprise needs, resources and domestic elements. The figures for later years comprise block grant and domestic rate relief grant. Figures for 1979-80 to 1981-82 are final entitlements. Figures for 1982-83 onwards are latest estimates after holdback.
■ Figures cover Merseyside MCC area plus Districts of Ellesmere Port and Halton.
• Provisional figure.

The table does not cover expenditure by nationalised industries or statutory undertakers (other than Government payments to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company), or payments such as social security benefits, which go to individuals rather than areas. Figures for local authority expenditure in the area since 1979-80 are:

It does not include contributions to the Housing Revenue Account or special funds.
‖ Provisional figure.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Deakins asked the Prime Minister how many employees whose pay is subject to wages council regulation are receiving family income supplement.

The Prime Minister: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Engagements

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 January.

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 24 January.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 24 January.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 24 January.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friends to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Cowans).

NATIONAL FINANCE

Transport (VAT)

9. Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received regarding the possible imposition of value added tax on transport.

Mr. Hayhoe: About 20 letters.

Oil Revenues

11. Sir William van Straubenzee asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect he calculates the current value of the pound sterling against the dollar will have in respect of oil revenues for the year 1984-85.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The 1984 Autumn Statement forecast of total tax take from the North sea in 1984-85 is £12 billion, £1·8 billion higher than expected at the 1984 Budget. Sterling oil prices in 1984 have been much as expected at the Autumn Statement.

16. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increased tax revenue from North sea oil available to the Government for each one per cent. fall in the pound sterling against the dollar.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In practice, the dollar oil price and value of sterling tend to move in the same direction. However, it is estimated that, other things being equal, a 1 per cent. fall in the dollar/sterling exchange rate would increase North sea revenues by about £150 million in a full year.

Income Tax

18. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the speed and efficacy with which tax offices deal with ordinary income tax cases.

Mr. Hayhoe: Although in general tax offices are operating efficiently, there have been accumulations of work in certain areas giving rise to some delays. Every effort is being made to overcome these arrears.

Tax Cuts (Job Creation)

19. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the impact of tax cuts on unemployment.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Income tax cuts will stimulate initiative and enterprise, ease the unemployment and poverty traps, and exert a moderating influence on wages. This provides the best route to a sustained increase in output and employment, and reduction in unemployment.

Building Alterations (VAT)

20. Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the imposition of value added tax on building alterations.

Mr. Hayhoe: Treasury Ministers continue to receive a number of representations from businesses and consumers affected by the change.

Pension Funds (Taxation)

21. Mr. Amess asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received concerning tax exemptions in relation to pension funds.

23. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the tax treatment of pension benefits and lump sums.

48. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received expressing concern at possible taxation of lump sum payments.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A considerable number of letters about pension provisions have been received, in addition to representations from various trade associations and representative bodies.

Infrastructure (Capital Investment)

22. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evaluation he had done of the effect on employment of capital investment in infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Rees: Additional public expenditure on capital investment in infrastructure without offsetting savings would not create lasting jobs because it would raise interest rates and inflation.

National Economic Development Council

24. Mr. Soames asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the National Economic Development Council meeting held on 9 January.

Mr. Peter Rees: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes).

Southampton Freeport

25. Mr. Chope asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the functioning of the Southampton freeport.

Mr. Hayhoe: Following designation by Treasury order as one of the six experimental free zones, Southampton freeport opened for business on 6 August last year. Commercial development of the zone is the responsibility of the zone operator.

Privatisation

26. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the net income to the Treasury of all privatisation since 1979.

Mr. Peter Rees: Net receipts from special sales of assets since 1979 amount to around £4,900 million.

Inflation

27. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current rate of price inflation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The increase in the retail prices index over the 12 months to December was 4·6 per cent.

Tax Cuts (Imports)

28. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the impact of tax cuts on imports.

Mr. Moore: Tax cuts will raise disposable incomes and spending, and part of the additional spending will be on imports. But they will also improve the supply performance of the economy, increasing exports and encouraging import substitution.

Infrastructure

29. Mr. Hayes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to improve the United Kingdom infrastructure.

Mr. Peter Rees: Total capital investment in this country is already running at a record level. The recently published public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428), shows that the public sector is spending substantial sums on the nation's infrastructure.

Pound Sterling

30. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his plans to arrest the depreciation of the pound sterling in relation to the US dollar and other currencies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have nothing to add to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement on 14 January at column 23.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

31. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what impact he expects there to be on the public sector borrowing requirement of the Government's December decision to restrict local authority expenditure from their capital receipts.

Mr. Peter Rees: The decisions announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 18 December were designed to keep local authority capital spending in 1985-86 to the level provided for in the Government's expenditure plans.

Economic Progress

32. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether there have been any further signs of an increase in economic activity.

Mr. Peter Rees: Yes. Making allowance for the coal strike, in the third quarter of 1984 GDP was around 3 per cent. above its 1983 third quarter level. In the three months to November 1984 manufacturing output rose by an estimated 1¼ per cent. to reach a level 8½ per cent. above its trough in the first quarter of 1981.

Whisky Industry

33. Mr. Wallace asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the whisky industry regarding the burden of taxation on the industry.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have received a number of representations from the whisky industry complaining about the burden of both direct and indirect taxation.

Wage Cuts (Economic Effects)

34. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect that real wage cuts have on the economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: The most important effect that a fall in real wages would have on the economy would be on employment. An estimate of this was given to the House by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 30 October 1984 at column 1183.

Air Crews (Duty-free Allowance)

35. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring the duty-free allowance for air crew in line with that allowed for other travellers.

Mr. Hayhoe: No.

Public Expenditure

36. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much public expenditure has been altered in real terms since 1979.

Mr. Peter Rees: The 1985 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9428) shows in table 2.6 that the public expenditure planning total has increased in real terms from £111·8 billion in 1979-80 to an estimated outturn of £122·3 billion in 1984-85 (1983-84 prices).

Construction Industry (VAT)

37. Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with representatives of the construction industry about the effect of the European Economic Community sixth directive in respect of value added tax on non-domestic construction work.

Mr. Hayhoe: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor had two meetings last year with representatives of the Building Employers Confederation at which they made clear their concern about the possible loss of zero-rating.

£1 Notes

38. Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of £1 notes at present in circulation.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Approximately 554 million.

Books and Newspapers (VAT)

39. Mr. Bruce asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received concerning the possible imposition of value added tax on books and newspapers.

46. Mr. Barron asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received on the proposed introduction of value added tax on the book publishing and newspaper industry.

49. Sir John Farr asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further representations he has had in relation to the imposition of value added tax on the printed word.

Mr. Hayhoe I refer to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 9 January 1985 at column 484. Since then, Treasury Ministers have received a further 300 representations arguing against the imposition of VAT on books, newspapers and periodicals.

Manufacturing Industry

40. Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the level of investment and production in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Peter Rees: Investment by manufacturing industry was up nearly 15 per cent. in the first three quarters of 1984 compared with the same period of 1983. The December DTI investment intentions survey indicated that manufacturing investment should rise by a substantial 7 per cent. in 1985 compared with 1984. Growth in manufacturing output in the three months to November 1984 was up 3¼ per cent. on the same period in 1983. It is now 8½ per cent. above its 1981 trough.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

41. Mr. Corbyn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the latest cost of the Johnson Matthey bank rescue.

45. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the latest figures for the Bank of England's financial commitment arising out of the rescue of Johnson Matthey.

Mr. Ian Stewart: This is a matter for the Bank of England.

Industrial Competitiveness

42. Mr. Favell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what fiscal proposals he has to increase industry's competitiveness.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend will keep industry's competitive position along with other factors in mind when considering his Budget proposals.

Tax Cuts (Economic Demand)

43. Mr. Bermingham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement regarding the impact of tax cuts on the level of demand in the United Kingdom economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: Tax cuts will raise demand in the short term. But the important effects in the longer term are on the supply side.

Coal Industry Dispute

44. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the cost to the economy of the dispute in the mining industry.

Mr. Peter Rees: I have nothing to add to the answer I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 15 November 1984 at column 324. Cmnd. 9428, presented to Parliament on Tuesday 22 January, was prepared on the same basis, and it is too soon to give any new estimate.

Wage Cuts (Job Creation)

47. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the evidence on which he said on 13 December 1984, Official Report, column 1194, that each 1 per cent. reduction in the rate of increase of real pay would be likely, in time, to add between 150,000 and 200,000 new jobs.

Mr. Peter Rees: A survey of the evidence will be published by the Treasury very shortly.

Management Consultants

50. Mr. Boyes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what purposes his Department has employed the services of any management consultants since 1979.

Mr. Hayhoe: Management consultants have been employed for five studies since 1979: the evaluation of pay data; advice on nationalised industry board remuneration; the new management accounting and information system; monitoring the freeports system; and, jointly with the Home Office, on the efficiency of prison industries.

Common Market (VAT Resources)

51. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate has been made of the effect on the economies of the United Kingdom and Europe of the increase in public expenditure involved in the recent decision of the Council of Ministers to increase the value added tax resources of the Common Market by 40 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The agreement at Fontainebleau to increase the VAT ceiling from 1 to 1·4 per cent. was taken into account in the projection of the United Kingdom's net payments to Community institutions contained in the public expenditure White Paper published on 22 January. Because the United Kingdom's contribution will be reduced by an abatement, the Fontainebleau agreement actually provides for a maximum increase in VAT own resources of substantially less than the full 1·4 per cent. By resolving the budget problem, the Fontainebleau agreement should now allow the Community to concentrate on achieving a genuine common market in goods and services, leading to more efficiency in the economies of Britain and other member states.

Corporation Tax

52. Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of agreed losses for corporation tax purposes which are currently available to be carried forward into future computations of corporation tax.

Mr. Moore: About £25 billion, excluding the public sector.

Deceased Persons (Estates)

Mr. Butterfill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number in each of the last five years of estates of deceased persons having a net probate value, excluding where it passes to a surviving spouse the value of his house or flat and household effects of less than (a) £1,000, (b) £1,500 and (c) £2,000.

Mr. Moore: The information available centrally does not allow estimates to be made in the detail requested. However, between the financial years 1978-79 and 1982-83 some 350,000 to 400,000 deaths each year did not result in an application for probate because the solely owned assets of the deceased were too small to need it —as may be the case where there are jointly owned assets passing by survivorship, for which probate is not required. Of the 250,000 to 300,000 deaths a year resulting in probate applications, approximately 35,000 owned less than £1,000, approximately 15,000 owned between £1,000 and £1,500 and another 15,000 between £1,500 and £2,000, in each case excluding any house and contents. It is not known how many of them left surviving spouses.

Value Added Tax Tribunals

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to seek powers for value added tax tribunals to examine the imposition of penalties by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Government's proposals concerning the role of the VAT tribunals in relation to the proposed penalties are contained in draft clause 15 of appendix 5 to the consultative paper "The Collection of Value Added Tax" published by Customs and Excise in November last year. Views expressed in response to the consultative paper will be taken into account when final decisions are made prior to publication of the 1985 Finance Bill.

Obscene Publications (Imports)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a copy of the guidance notes issued by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to customs officers in respect of their actions relating to the importation of indecent or obscene books.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer the hon. Member to the final part of the answer I gave on 4 December 1984, at column 177, to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). It is not the practice to publish the Department's internal standing instructions.

Revenue Statistics

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures tabulating for 1982-83 and 1983-84 revenue from each of the following: (a) income tax, (b) employers' national insurance contributions, (c) employees' national insurance contribution, (d) self-employed national insurance contribution, (e) voluntary class III contributions, (f) state scheme premiums and (g) advance corporation tax.

Mr. Moore: The table gives the revenue received by central Government from the following:

£ million

	1982-83	1983-84
Income tax	30,474	31,280
Employers' national insurance contributions	8,750	9,634
Employees' national insurance contributions	7,220	8,243
Self-employed national insurance contributions	412	487
Voluntary Class III contributions	18	26
State scheme premiums	264	280
Advance corporation tax	2,222	2,137

Press Releases

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many copies of each of their press releases are normally issued by the Inland Revenue and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, respectively; and what arrangements are made for their dissemination.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Inland Revenue normally issues some 3,250 copies of each of its press releases—to the national and main provincial media (including radio and television) through the news distribution service (NDS) of the Central Office of Information, and by direct post to specialist and technical publications and representative bodies and to subscribers to the departmental mailing list.

Customs and Excise press releases are intended primarily for the media and publication points; about 1,100 are issued of each. The NDS of the COI is used for distribution to television and radio outlets, to the national and provincial press and to certain trade and specialist journals. Copies can also be obtained by interested parties from the NDS on a subscription basis. In addition, Customs and Excise distributes copies by direct post to other trade and technical outlets — including the accountancy and legal press — and to professional bodies.

EC (Sixth Directive 77/388)

Mr. Hannam asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the status of the sixth EEC directive (77/388/EEC) in Britain; and what implications sub-paragraphs (b), (g), (h), (i), (l), (m) and (n) of article 13 A1 have for charitable organisations in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hayhoe: The sixth directive was a VAT harmonisation measure made pursuant to articles 99 and 100 of the treaty of Rome and adopted by the Council on 19 May 1977. Under article 189 of the treaty, a directive is binding as to the result to be achieved upon each member state to which it is addressed, but the choice of form and method is left to the national authorities. It is accepted in law that certain provisions of a directive which have not been implemented by a member state can be directly invoked by an appellant if they are applicable to his case.

Article 13 A 1 (b), (g), (h), (i), (l), (m) and (n) of the sixth directive provides exemption for particular supplies of goods and services subject to conditions laid down in the article. Sub-paragraphs (m) and (n) are subject to the transitional provisions in article 28 3*(a)* and annex E, and the supplies in question may continue to be taxed. The remaining sub-paragraphs provide exemption for a range of goods and services supplied in the public interest by bodies which may include charities; the great majority of these supplies are already exempt or otherwise relieved in the United Kingdom. However, in a recent appeal heard by the High Court—the Yoga for Health Foundation v. the Commissioners of Customs and Excise — it was ruled that certain residential courses in therapeutic yoga were covered by the exemption provided for in article 13 A 1 (g). These courses have now been relieved, and I am now considering what changes in the legislation governing exemption from VAT may be necessary as a consequence of the decision.

Personal Tax Allowances

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will re-calculate the figures given in his answer to the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) on 20 December, Official Report, column 321, about personal tax allowances assuming no increase on top of indexation in the levels at which higher rates of income tax become payable.

Mr. Moore: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Exchange Rate (Profits and Losses)

Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the light of the decision in Pattison v. Marine Midland Ltd., he will make a statement on the treatment for tax purposes of profits and losses resulting from exchange rate fluctuations.

Mr. Moore: The Inland Revenue is, with my approval, issuing a provisional statement of practice on the tax treatment of profits and losses which result from exchange rate fluctuations. The provisional statement is put forward as a practical guide to facilitate the preparation and agreement of tax computations in the light of the decision in the Marine Midland case. I am placing a copy of it in the Library of the House. I have authorised the Revenue to consult interested parties on the scope and content of the provisional statement, on the basis of the law as it stands, and to issue a definitive statement of practice in due course in the light of any comments received. In the meantime, the Revenue will be prepared, if the taxpayer wishes, to settle tax liabilities on the basis of the practice outlined in the provisional statement.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

British Telecom

86. Mr. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the total cost of the British Telecom flotation.

Mr. Butcher: In the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on 27 November 1984, at columns 435-36, I said that the costs that could be estimated at that time were about £128 million. I can now add to that the value of free and matching shares supplied to British Telecom employees, which was £51·5 million, and the cost of receiving bank and initial registration work which is estimated at about £10 million.

Cheese (Imports)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish a table showing the volume of imported cheese by country of origin, for the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available.

Mr. Channon: The available information is as follows:

November 1983—October 1984

Country of Consignment	Thousand Tonnes
Irish Republic	48·5
Federal Republic of Germany	22·0
Netherlands	21·3
Denmark	15·0
Belgium-Luxembourg	12·3
France	10·8
New Zealand	7·1
Australia	3·6
Canada	3·1
Italy	2·3
Austria	1·4
Switzerland	1·1
Other countries	0·7
Total trade	149·2

Source: data corresponding to SITC(R2) (Cheese and Curd) in the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics.
Notes:
(a) Corresponding information by country of origin could be provided only at disproportionate cost.
(b) Owing to rounding, there may be some discrepancy between the figure for total trade and the sum of constituent items.

Inflation Accounting

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions have taken place between officials of his Department and representatives of the Accounting Standards Committee about the possibility of giving legislative backing to an accounting standard for inflation accounting.

Mr. Fletcher: My officials are frequently in contact with the Accounting Standards Committee about a range of topics. A recent meeting included discussions on the prospects for an accounting standard for inflation accounting.

Overseas Trade Fairs

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to increase the amount of assistance which is available from his Department to enable British manufacturers to take part in overseas trade fairs.

Mr. Channon: Proposals for expenditure on export promotion services over the next few years, including support for groups at overseas trade fairs, are set out in a consultation document issued by the British Overseas Trade Board on 3 December 1984 to organisations representing industry and commerce. The document is available in the library of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much assistance was given to British manufacturers (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the north-west to enable them to take part in overseas trade fairs in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Channon: Relevant details are not readily available to distinguish between the north-west and other areas, nor are they available to differentiate between manufacturers and other exporters. The overall figures for assistance given by the British Overseas Trade Board to groups of British exporters at overseas exhibitions for the last five financial years are as follows:

	Number of exhibitions at which support was given	Number of exhibitors supported	Net cost to BOTB (£ thousand)
1979-80	360	8,223	12,100
1980-81	333	7,178	9,023
1981-82	348	7,366	11,122
1982-83	360	7,318	11,273
1983-84	366	7,509	10,890

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all those businesses based in the north-west which have recently received assistance from his Department to enable them to take part in overseas trade fairs.

Mr. Channon: BOTB support at overseas trade fairs was provided to 430 exhibitors from the north-west during 1984. That figure includes support at more than one exhibition for some companies. I will send a list of the exhibitors to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance is available from his Department to enable British manufacturers to take part in overseas trade fairs.

Mr. Channon: For events it supports the British Overseas Trade Board will arrange and pay for the provision of space and appropriate stands at an overseas exhibition. A proportion of the costs will be charged to exhibitors in the BOTB group, normally with lower rates for newcomers to the event and for firms exhibiting there for the second time. In addition, assistance towards travel costs for up to two representatives of each company in the groups is at present available at exhibitions outside most of Western Europe. Details are given in the BOTB consultation document dated 3 December 1984.

The whole range of other services provided by the BOTB and diplomatic commercial staff overseas is also available.

Outward Missions Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total expenditure upon the outward missions scheme in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and how much of this was spent on firms based in the north-west of England in each of those years.

Mr. Channon: The total expenditure upon the outward mission scheme in each of the last five years for which figures are available is as follows:

1979-80	959,000
1980-81	838,000
1981-82	1,051,000
1982-83	1,048,000
1983-84	1,536,000

With the exception of 1979-80, for which records are not readily available, the amount spent on firms based in the north-west of England was as follows:

1980-81	84,961
1981-82	99,080
1982-83	91,535
1983-84	123,020

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all those firms based in the north-west of England which have received assistance under the outward missions scheme in the last year for which details are available.

Mr. Channon: In 1984 some 226 firms based in the north-west of England participated in outward missions with assistance from the British Overseas Trade Board, 62 of them more than once. I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible with a list of the firms.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those countries which are not covered by the outward missions scheme; and what are the reasons for each exception.

Mr. Channon: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Market Entry Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the total expenditure upon the market entry guarantee scheme in each of the years since its introduction; and how much of these funds in each of those years was paid to firms operating in the north-west of England.

Mr. Channon: The figures are as follows:

Gross Expenditure Under the Market Entry Guarantee Scheme (financial years ended 31 March—) in £000s

	Total	Amount received by firms located in the North West Region
1978-79	274	78
1979-80	864	86
1980-81	1,222	122
1981-82	1,482	144
1982-83	1,857	158
1983-84	2,185	324

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all those firms which are currently based in the north-west of England which have received assistance under the market entry guarantee scheme in the last year for which details are available.

Mr. Channon: Applications for assistance under the market entry guarantee scheme are regarded as being confidential between the Department and firms. It is therefore not possible to provide the names of firms in the north-west. However, 65 firms were offered assistance under the scheme in 1984 and four of them were in the north-west.

Export Marketing Research Service

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been total Government expenditure upon the export marketing research service in each of the years since its introduction; and what percentage of this expenditure was accounted for by grants towards the cost of research undertaken by firms based in the north-west of England in each of those years.

Mr. Channon: Figures for total gross expenditure under the scheme are given for the financial years 1969-70 to 1983-84. It is not possible, without disproportionate cost, to provide information about the expenditure on firms in the north-west for each of those financial years. However, figures are given for the last three financial years.

Gross expenditure under the export marketing research scheme

Financial year	Total expenditure	North-West Region Expenditure	Percentage share (by value)
	£'s	£'s	per cent.
1969-70	9,900	—	—
1970-71	54,500	—	—
1971-72	37,400	—	—
1972-73	174,000	—	—
1973-74	299,400	—	—
1974-75	184,000	—	—
1975-76	302,000	—	—
1976-77	334,896	—	—
1977-78	413,892	—	—
1978-79	547,237	—	—
1979-80	492,683	—	—
1980-81	309,471	—	—
1981-82	455,731	32,222	7·1
1982-83	1,076,964	74,355	7·0
1983-84	2,228,957	237,929	10·7

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all those firms based in the north-west of England which have received assistance under the export marketing research service in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Channon: Applications for assistance under the export marketing research scheme are regarded as being confidential between the Department and firms. It is therefore not possible to provide the names of firms in the north-west. However, of the 1,181 applications approved under the scheme in 1984, 87 were from firms located in the north-west region.

EC (Regional Policy Expenditure)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the total spending on regional policy by central Government in each member state of the EEC for each of the last five years for which information is available.

Mr. Trippier: The following is the information requested and has been supplied by the centre for the study of public policy, University of Strathclyde, Glasgow, from work sponsored, in part, by the Department.

Main regional incentives: Expenditure by Central Government in Member States of the EEC (Sterling, 1975 prices) 1978-82*

United Kingdom	422·6	397·3	348·6	364·4	319·0

* The figures comprise the main regional incentives in each country. In total, 32 incentives are covered and are estimated to account for well over 90 per cent. of regional incentive expenditure by national Governments. They do not cover other aspects of regional policy such as the provision of infrastructure. Expenditure on advance factories in the United Kingdom is also excluded. (Source: page 8 and table 2, European Regional Incentives, Yuill, D. and Allen K. Centre for the Study of Public Policy, University of Strathclyde, 1984). Calculations are made on the basis of net grant equivalent expenditure. 1982 is the most recent year for which comparable data are available. Data are not available on a comparable basis for Greece.

† PPP (purchasing power parities). The figures have been calculated on the basis of a common currency (sterling) using the purchasing power parities of 1975 (See Eurostat, National Accounts ESA—Aggregates 1960—1979, Luxembourg).

‡ Data are not available for Belgium at the national level for 1982.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the level of spending by central Government on regional policy in each member state of the EEC (a) in total and (b) per capita.

Mr. Trippier: The following is the information requested and has been supplied by the centre for the study of public policy, University of Strathclyde, Glasgow, from work sponsored, in part, by the Department.

Main regional incentives: Expenditure by central Government in member states of the EEC, 1982 (sterling, 1975 prices)*

Asbestos

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the undertakings given following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of asbestos and asbestos products in 1973 have been reviewed.

Mr. Fletcher: Yes. My right hon. Friend has decided, in accordance with the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, to release Turner and Newall plc from the last remaining undertaking given following the 1973 Monopolies and Mergers Commission report.

The commission found a number of Turner and Newall's policies and practices in the field of asbestos products to be against the public interest, and Turner and Newall gave four undertakings to the Secretary of State to remedy the detriments indentified by the commission. The company discharged its commitments under three of these undertakings some time ago and the only one remaining in force was an undertaking not to acquire any company which is a competitor or customer of Turner and Newall in asbestos products without the consent of the Secretary of State. The Director General of Fair Trading recently reviewed this undertaking in accordance with his responsibilities under the Fair Trading Act and recommended that Turner and Newall should be released from it.

The Director General reached his view in the light of changes in the market, including the declining importance of asbestos and the increasing number of substitutes from asbestos products, and of Turner and Newall's progress in achieving divestment of its asbestos mining interests. He commented that future substantial acquisitions by Turner and Newall could be scrutinised in accordance with the merger provisions of the Fair Trading Act.

My right hon. Friend accepted the Director General's recommendation and his advice that any future acquisition which resulted in a market share of 25 per cent. or more for Turner and Newall in the field of asbestos products should be looked at particularly closely.

Telecommunications for the Hearing-Impaired (Report)

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish the first report of his Department's working group on telecommunications for the hearing-impaired.

Mr. Butcher: I have received the working group's first report and decided that it should be published. Copies of the report and accompanying press notice have been placed in the Library of the House.

I welcome the report and believe that the proposed code of practice, which the group is now preparing, will give real help to hearing-impaired people by providing designers of both telephones and hearing aids with the information they need to ensure that their products work together effectively.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

GCHQ (Staff)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Government communications headquarters staff have replied to the letters from management asking them where they want to go; and how many have refused to sign relevant forms.

Mr. Rifkind: Thirty-four staff have replied to letters from management asking them to indicate their preferences for a transfer. Forty-one staff have either not yet replied or have declined to indicate a preference.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with provision of doctors and flying doctor services in the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: The Falkland Islands Government, who are responsible for the civilian medical services of the Falkland Islands, have confirmed that they are satisfied with the present provision of three civilian doctors and with the flying doctor service, which has first claim on the use of the Government Air Service.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role is envisaged for the airport at Port Stanley in the economic development of the Falklands.

Mr. Renton: We envisage that after the completion of the new airport at Mount Pleasant Port Stanley airport will continue to have an important role in providing a base for air communication within the islands.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the airport at Port Stanley is to be used for the transport of air freight and civilian passengers; what representations he has received in this respect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The airport at Port Stanley has long been used for the transport of air freight and civilian passengers. Once the new Mount Pleasant airport is fully operational Port Stanley airport will continue to perform this function for internal traffic. We have received no representations on this matter.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the recommendations made in the second Shackleton report in respect of an airport on the Falklands and its uses, indicating which of the recommendations have been carried out.

Mr. Renton: The Falkland Islands Economic Study 1982 (Cmnd. 8653) recommended that:

(a) the new runway should be not less than 8,500 feet; capable of receiving medium-haul jets direct from South American cities and DC 10s from Ascension Island.

(b) as a matter of the highest priority, steps be taken as politically appropriate to establish a civil external air service.

(c) the new air service be operated by a contract airline operator under the Falkland Islands Government. On the grounds of cost, taken together with the need for reasonable flexibility on onwards connections, the optimum service is considered to be via Punta Arenas.

The main runway of the new Mount Pleasant airport will meet the first of these recommendations.

We would welcome the resumption of commercial air links between the Falklands and the South American mainland, and hope these will evolve naturally.

Cyprus

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom's position as a guarantor power for Cyprus is the subject of negotiations in the context of the present inter-communal talks under the auspices of the United Nations' Secretary General in New York.

Mr. Renton: While the general question of guarantees for any settlement has been raised, we are not aware that the United Kingdom's role in this respect has been the subject of discussion.

Sexual Discrimination (Convention)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has now received objecting to ratification by the British Government of the United Nations convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Renton: We have received 18 such representations since the beginning of 1984 from private individuals, Members of Parliament and members of interested organisations. In the same period we have received 33 representations urging the Government to ratify the Convention.

Indian Sub-continent (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent visit of a Minister from his Department to the Indian sub-continent.

Mr. Renton: I visited Pakistan from 2 to 8 January and Bangladesh from 8 to 11 January at the invitation of the respective Governments.

I had useful talks on matters of mutual interest with senior members of both Governments and familiarised myself with the work of our missions, in particular on immigration matters.

Anglo-Israel Relations

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what effect the further colonisation of the West Bank has had on relations between Israel and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Luce: We and our European partners have consistently made clear our view that Israel's policy of building settlements in occupied territory is illegal and an obstacle to peace. My right hon. and learned Friend made this point personally to Israeli Ministers during his visit to Israel in October 1984.

The announcement by Israel on 10 January of six new settlements is a negative step which undermines confidence in Israel's intentions.

SCOTLAND

Miscarriages and Abortions

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women resident in the postal districts FK4, FK5 and FK6 have had (a) miscarriages and (b) abortions in each of the past 12 years; and how these figures compare with the corresponding figures for the whole of Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The only statistics available centrally on miscarriages are those obtained from the hospital records of patients treated for spontaneous abortion. Hospital records were not post-coded prior to 1975; but since that date the number of patients treated in hospital for spontaneous abortion was as follows:

	Postcodes FK4, 5, 6	All Scotland
1975	56	6,952
1976	54	6,669
1977	64	6,625
1978	57	6,980
1979	61	6,471
1980	63	7,184
1981	64	6,988
1982	53	6,771

In addition to spontaneous abortions, therapeutic abortions were performed on the following number of patients:

1975	32	7,327
1976	44	7,219
1977	42	7,334
1978	48	7,451
1979	48	7,784
1980	58	7,905
1981	49	9,007
1982	51	8,425

Information is not yet available centrally for later years.

Malformed Babies

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many malformed babies have been born to mothers resident in the postal districts FK4, FK5 and FK6 in each of the past 12 years; and how these figures compare with the corresponding figures for the whole of Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The notification of anomalies at birth is not a statutory requirement and figures for the whole of Scotland are not available. The figures for FK4, 5 and 6 which are readily available show that the number of live births with anomaly were as follows:

	Number
1976	34
1977	43
1978	39
1979	25
1980	41
1981	47

Of this total of 229 children born with anomalies, only 23 could be considered as having major defects.

Information is not yet available centrally for later years.

Council Houses (Cost)

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the current cost of a three-apartment and four-apartment local authority house in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: The costs depend on a number of factors, including the form and the location of a housing development. Typical average costs including professional fees but excluding land costs are as follows:—

3-apartment	26,300
4-apartment	28,300

Fire Certificates

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many establishments in Scotland subject to the Fire Precautions (Hotels and Boarding Houses) (Scotland) Order 1972 have still to receive a fire certificate.

Mr. Younger: I understand, from information provided by fire authorities, that on 31 December 1984 there were 138 such establishments.

Teachers (Pay)

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what reply he has received from teachers' representatives to his proposal that the Scottish joint negotiating committee should conduct a review of teachers' pay and conditions of service within the framework of existing procedures.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Dunfermline West (Mr. Douglas) on 16 January at columns 314-317. My right hon. Friend subsequently received a formal request from the Scottish joint negotiating committee for teaching staff in school education that he should meet a combined deputation from the management and teachers' sides, and he has agreed to do this on 28 January.

Leith Nautical College

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations on the subject of Leith nautical college and its future have been received by his Department.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Representations on the future of Leith nautical college have been recieved from some 80 individuals and organisations, including seven hon. Members, and I have also received a petition containing about 9,000 signatures.

Broadleaved Woodland

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions the Forestry Commission will be holding with the (a) Council for the Protection of Rural England and (b) the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds about "Broadleaves in Britain" before the seminar on 8 May at which the new draft policies for broadleaved woodland will be presented.

Mr. John Mackay: The Forestry Commission received detailed comments from these two bodies in response to its consultative paper "Broadleaves in Britain". Those comments are being taken into account in formulating draft policy proposals for discussion at the seminar on 8 May 1985, to which both bodies have been invited, and the Commission does not consider it necessary to have any further consultations with them before then.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions the Forestry Commission will be holding with the Woodland Trust about "Broadleaves in Britain" before announcing its revised policy proposals for broadleaved woodland in Britain.

Mr. John Mackay: The Forestry Commission received detailed comments from the Woodland Trust in response to the consultative paper "Broadleaves in Britain" and these are being taken into consideration in formulating draft policy proposals. The Commission does not consider it necessary to have any further consultations with the trust.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether representatives of the National Farmers Union or the Country Landowners Association have met the Forestry Commission since September 1984 to discuss "Broadleaves in Britain" and its revision of policies for broadleaved woodland.

Mr. John MacKay The Forestry Commission will be meeting representatives of the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners' Association on 25 January 1985.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which non-governmental organisations representing timber production and forestry interests have met the Forestry Commission since September 1984 to discuss the "Broadleaves in Britain" review and its revision of policy on broadleaved woodland.

Mr. John MacKay The Forestry Commission has had meetings recently on this subject with representatives of Timber Growers UK, the British Timber Merchants' Association (England and Wales) and the Institute of Chartered Foresters.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which conservation organisations have met the Forestry Commission's working group since September 1984 to discuss "Broadleaves in Britain" in the light of the submissions received.

Mr. John MacKay The Forestry Commission has had recent meetings on this subject with the Countryside Commission, the Countryside Commission for Scotland and the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the organisations which responded to the Forestry Commission's "Broadleaves in Britain," consultative paper; and which of these organisations have been invited to the seminar organised by the commission on 8 May to discuss its draft policy proposals for broadleaves in Britain.

Mr. John MacKay The information is given in the table below:

The organisations marked with an asterisk have been invited to the Forestry Commission seminar on 8 May 1985. The following organisations have also been invited to the seminar:—

Convention of Scottish Local Authorities Home Timber Merchants' Association of Scotland National Hardwoods Programme Scottish Wildlife Trust

In addition to the organisations listed in the table, the Forestry Commission received comments on the consultative paper from a number of private individuals

Scottish Special Housing Association

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's income to its housing revenue account, under the headings deficit subsidy, rents and other income, for each of the years from 1978-79 to the present;

(2) if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's expenditure from its housing revenue account, under the headings loan charges, repairs and maintenance, management and other, for each of the years from 1978-79 to 1984-85; and what is the estimated expenditure under these headings in 1985-86;

(3) if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's capital spending as broken down between new build, modernisation and any other relevant items for each of the years from 1979-80 to the present;

(4) if he will set out for the Scottish Special Housing Association expenditure from the housing revenue account on repairs and maintenance and management per house for each of the years from 1978-79 to 1984-85 and the estimated expenditure under these headings in 1985-86.

Mr. Ancram: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out the Scottish Special Housing Association's capital allocation for each of the years from 1979-80 to the present.

Mr. Ancram: The figures are as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	40·0
1980-81	42·0
1981-82	45·2
1982-83	43·6
1983-84	34·0
1984-85	26·0

Figures prior to 1981-82 are gross figures: those for 1981-82 onwards are net figures, exclusive of receipts.

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average rent per annum charged by the Scottish Special Housing Association for each year from 1978-79 to the present time.

Mr. Ancram: Average annual rents at 30 September from 1977 to 1983 are published in "Public Sector Rents 1983-84" (Scottish Development Department Statistical Bulletin HSIU No. 7), a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. The average annual rent for SSHA dwellings at 30 September 1984 was £676·74.

Salmon

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the principal achievements of his Department in protecting salmon stocks in 1984.

Mr. John Mackay: The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland has stepped up its efforts to enforce the ban on drift-net fishing for salmon in the sea off Scotland, with a considerable degree of success. This has been welcomed by the salmon interests.

The Government have been pressing for a curtailment of fishing for salmon on the high seas, and agreement was reached last year on a substantial reduction in the quota for the Greenland salmon fishery.

Power has been taken in the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984 to prohibit fishing for salmon in the sea by means of specified nets set other than from a boat and to ban the carriage of certain types of nets by British vessels in Scottish waters. My right hon. Friend's Department is discussing the implementation of the provisions of that Act with the appropriate organisations.

The Department has continued its research into means of protecting and enhancing salmon stocks.

Seals (Orkney)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to order a cull of the seal population of Orkney.

Mr. John Mackay: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a similar question from him on 14 January. My right hon. Friend has not yet reached conclusions on the question whether there is a need for grey seal management in Scottish waters.

Beaufort Dyke

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent use has been made of the Beaufort dyke explosives dumping area in the north channel of the Irish sea: whether the dumping ground is made available to commercial and industrial interests; what restrictions exist on the substances which can be dumped; and whether the site is regularly checked for leakage and environmental pollution.

Mr. George Younger: No licences have been issued for the disposal of waste in the Beaufort dyke area in recent years. A small quantity of concrete waste was dumped there in 1981: it was due to be taken to deep water well to the west of Scotland but it had to be dumped at Beaufort dyke because of adverse weather.

Licences for the dumping of waste in that area by commercial or industrial interests would be granted only in an emergency and would depend upon the nature of the waste products.

Because of the non-toxic nature of the materials that have been dumped at Beaufort dyke it has not been considered necessary to check for leakage or environmental pollution.

NHS Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the report by the Government Actuary on his actuarial investigation of the National Health Service superannuation scheme for Scotland for the five-year period ended 31 March 1979 will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: The report will be published tomorrow and copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

The report shows that, as the notional balance of £282 million to be met by employing authorities would be more than adequately covered by the current 7½ per cent. of salary paid by employers, their rate of contribution could be reduced, as the Actuary recommends, to 5½ per cent. of salary. This, however, would not cover the full cost of payments to members of the scheme as it takes no account of pension increases, the costs of which are met by the Exchequer. In view of this, and the Government's general policy that contribution rates should be realistic, I do not intend to alter the present rate.

The report indicates that, throughout the 5-year period, all employment groups have been affected by a general trend towards retirement at an earlier age. The number of pensioners in the scheme on 31 March 1979, at approximately 18,000 showed an increase of 40 per cent. in the period. Significant further increases can be expected for many years because of the relative immaturity of the scheme and the increase in the number of contributors.

NORTHERN IRELAND

War Service (Superannuation)

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to introduce legislation to render uniform the treatment of war service for superannuation purposes in public employment as between Great Britain and Northern Ireland; and to what extent such legislation will be retrospective.

Dr. Boyson: War service is already given uniform treatment. Regulations will be soon be made to recognise the war service of people who left local government schemes in Great Britain after 1950 but were still in public sector employment elsewhere in 1978; comparable legislation will be introduced for Northern Ireland.

If the right hon. Gentleman has a particular case in mind, I shall be happy to look into it.

Students

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the meaning of "ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom" referred to in the Student Awards Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1984 is the same as that contained in the decision of the House of Lords in December 1982 in respect of the Local Education Authority Awards Regulations 1979.

Mr. Scott: Yes, in the opinion of the Department of Education for Northern Ireland, and subject to any ruling in the courts. However, the eligibility requirements for mandatory awards set out in the Northern Ireland regulations are not the same as those specified in the Local Education Authority Awards Regulations 1979.

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of road deaths in Ulster during 1984; and if he will give a breakdown of this figure.

Mr. Chris Patten: The provisional total number of road deaths in Northern Ireland for 1984 is 189. The breakdown is as follows:

	Number
Drivers	54
Passengers	39
Pedestrians	65
Cyclists	13
Motorcyclists	15
Pillion Passengers	3
Total	189

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many motorists who died during 1984 in road traffic accidents in Ulster and who were either drivers or front seat passengers would appear not to have been wearing seat belts at the time of the accident.

Mr. Chris Patten: A provisional total of 24 drivers and seven front-seat passengers killed in Northern Ireland road accidents during 1984 would appear not to have been wearing seat belts at the time of the accident.

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many rear seat passengers were killed in road traffic accidents in Ulster during 1984.

Mr. Chris Patten: The provisional total is 13.

Shooting Incident (Belfast)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will call for an inquiry into the shooting of Paul Gerard Kelly on 14 January in Belfast;

(2) what representations he has received concerning the shooting incident in Belfast on 14 January involving the Ulster Defence Regiment;

(3) if he will make a statement on the shooting in Belfast by members of the Ulster Defence Regiment on 14 January.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many families were on the waiting list for public housing in the Province at the latest date.

Mr. Chris Patten [pursuant to his reply, 22 January 1985, c. 389]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the total number of applicants on the waiting list at 30 September 1984 was 24,543.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Miss Gillian Ward (Appeal)

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there has been a delay in the hearing of the appeal of Miss Gillian Ward, national insurance no. WK625542A against refusal to pay statutory sick pay; and when it is proposed to hear her appeal.

Mr. Whitney: I regret that pressure of work in the local office concerned has led to delay in handling the case of Miss Gillian Ward, who asked on 29 October 1984 for an adjudication officer's decision on her title to statutory sick pay for two days in May 1984. A decision was issued on 16 January.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of extending housing benefit, on its present scale rates, to owner occupiers.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners in Scotland (a) householders and (b) non-householders were lifted off housing benefit supplement after 26 November 1984 as a result of (i) increasing the available scale margin and (ii) extending the available scale margin to heating additions.

Mr. Whitney: Housing benefit supplement is not payable to non-householders. Information on the small number of pensioner householders in Scotland who would have been lifted off housing benefit supplement as a result of changes to the available scale margin is not available.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his proposals for a prescribed list of drugs is precisely similar to the schemes in the countries listed in his answer of 7 December 1984, Official Report, column 318; and whether there is any residual discretion vested in medical staff directly in contact with patients in the other schemes he has studied;

(2) if, further to his answer of 7 December 1984, Official Report, column 318, he will publish in the Official Report details of the limited list drug schemes operating in other countries which have been studied by his Department; and if he will identify the similarities and the differences in relation to the proposed United Kingdom scheme.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government's limited list proposals were drawn up following detailed studies of the schemes in operation in many other countries. Our proposals reflect the best features of other schemes whilst at the same time attempting to avoid any difficulties experienced in their operation. There are therefore similarities between our proposals and the schemes now operating in a number of countries, but because of the differences in national health and insurance systems direct comparisons are not possible. Brief details of schemes operating in the countries listed in my reply are as follows:

1. Australia

A "white list" is operated. All drugs are assessed and only those which are needed for conditions not already covered adequately by the list, or are more effective or less toxic than a drug listed for the same purpose are included in the Pharmaceutical Benefits Scheme.

2. Belgium

A five-category system provides for different levels of patients contribution to the costs of medicines.

Category A:

Life Saving medicines—fully reimbursed.

Category B:

Therapeutically useful—patient pays 25 per cent. up to a limit which varies by patient category.

Categories C, Cs:

Less useful—patients pay 50 per cent., or 60 per cent. with a higher limit than B.

Category D:

Others—non-reimbursable.

3. France

In order to be reimbursed at all a drug must be on the Ministry's approved list. New drugs can be added only if they are either medically more effective or equally effective but less costly than already reimbursed drugs. For drugs that are reimbursed there are three levels of patient contribution:

i. essential drugs (24 listed conditions) —nil
ii. homeopathic medicines —30 per cent.
iii. drugs for the treatment of mild conditions—60 per cent.

4. West Germany

Federal Republic of Germany

There is a negative list of drugs, introduced in its present form in 1983, for which all adults have to pay in full. It includes tonics, laxatives, cough and cold treatments, minor analgesics, vitamins, antacids, rubs and inhalations, and travel sickness and slimming preparations. For other drugs patients pay a prescription charge.

5. Ireland

Patients on lower incomes are entitled to free health care under the state scheme, within which doctors may prescribe only from a limited list of some 900 drugs. Patients with higher incomes must join a voluntary (ie charitable or private) insurance scheme meeting certain minimum requirements.

6. Denmark

Medicines outside hospitals are reimbursed to the extent of 75 per cent., 50 per cent. or nil. Medicines for well defined, often mortal disease at 75 per cent., medicines with valuable therapeutic effect at 50 per cent. and all others including over-the-counter products are non-reimbursable.

7. Norway

Drugs are not licensed unless a need for them is established. A limited list of drugs required for the treatment of 36 specified chronic or long term conditions is partially reimbursed. Expensive drugs for other conditions may also be subsidised if approval is given in individual cases, otherwise patients pay the full cost of drugs not on the list.

8. Sweden

Drugs are licensed only if they are shown to have some advantage in terms of cost or efficacy over those already available. Drugs are provided free for 32 specified chronic conditions and for preventative maternal and child care. Most others are partially reimbursed but patients pay the full cost of prophylactic drugs.

9. The Netherlands

A blacklist of some 400 drugs which were considered unnecessarily expensive or of doubtful therapeutic effect or which were available over the counter was introduced in 1982. The Netherlands now has the lowest drug cost per patient in Europe.

10. Italy

About 1,400 priority drugs on an approved list of 5,000 are supplied for a prescription fee of 1,000 lire. For other drugs on the list the patient pays in addition 20 per cent. of the retail price subject to a fixed upper limit. Drugs not on the approved list are not reimbursed.

11. Spain

Contraceptives, dietary products and over-the-counter products are non-reimbursable. For the vast majority of reimbursable medicines, the patient pays a contribution of 40 per cent. of the cost. For a small number of priority drugs, the patient contribution is 10 per cent.

12. New Zealand

A limited list operates with preference for generic drugs. Charges may be waived by special permission.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he excluded the drug known as Naprosyn under his provisional proposals for limited list prescribing; and whether he will reconsider this proposal.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have explained publicly on several occasions that our proposals do not affect National Health Service provision of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs such as Naprosyn. There has never been any question of excluding Naprosyn from National Health Service prescribing.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why he excluded the laxative known as Dorbanex under his provisional proposals for limited list prescribing; and whether he will reconsider this proposal.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The provisional list announced on 8 November was only set out as the basis for detailed consultation. We will only decide which drugs will remain available on the National Health Service in the categories affected by our proposals after full consultation has taken place with the professions and the industry.

Benefits

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in Burnley are currently in receipt of benefit whilst in board and lodging accommodation in Burnley.

Mr. Whitney: Separate figures are not available for Burnley and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. At November 1983, the latest date for which statistics are available, there were 108,000 claimants in ordinary board and lodging in Great Britain.
Source: Annual Statistical Enquiry. Figures are provisional.

Dentists

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the current number of dentists in the National Health Service in relation to the demand for dental treatment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We will continue to keep dental manpower levels under review as, nationally, we may be on course for a surplus of dentists in relation to demand for dental treatment. There are, however, local variations in the distribution of dentists.

AIDS

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the number of laboratories designated and equipped to carry out investigations at the appropriate level of containment into acquired immune deficiency syndrome; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes. The precautions advocated in the interim guidelines on AIDS recently produced by the Advisory Committee on Dangerous Pathogens broadly equate to those already in force in clinical laboratories for dealing with hepatitis B virus. The guidelines do not impose a requirement on health authorities to designate laboratories for the examination of AIDS specimens. However the ACDP suggested that in view of the probable increase in the amount of work involving AIDS patients there may be operational advantages to health authorities in concentrating this at specific laboratories.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of current knowledge regarding acquired immune deficiency syndrome contaminated blood supplies, he is satisfied that adequate amounts of uncomtaminated blood are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are satisfied that all practicable steps are being taken to safeguard blood supplies in the light of current medical knowledge on AIDS. We are strengthening our efforts to dissuade persons in the AIDS high-risk groups from donating blood, and our revised leaflet "AIDS—Important New Advice for Blood Donors" will be distributed individually to all donors.

Tests to screen blood donations for the HTLV III antibody are being developed, but much evaluation work remains to be done before such a test could be used routinely.

District Nurses (Training)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to reduce the shortage of tutors for district nurse training; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Keneth Clarke: The numbers of nurse tutors depends on health authorities' demands for the training of district nurses. It is the responsibility of the English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting to ensure that the number of district nurse tutors is adequate to meet that demand. We have made money available for this purpose to the board who I understand are taking steps to encourage more district nurses to come forward for tutor training.

NHS (Managers)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district managers appointed to the National Health Service following implementation of the Griffiths report were appointed from within industry; and how many from within the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: So far, seven and none respectively, but one other was previously in local government.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what training is to be provided for National Health Service officers who become general managers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have already made some arrangements with the National Health Service Training Authority, which will be reviewed and strengthened as necessary by the chairman of the NHS management board. We anticipate a very great demand for management training within the NHS over the next few years.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the job description for general managers in the National Health Service; how this was compiled; and if it is standard between and within National Health Service regions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our guidance circular contains a description of the general management function we require health authorities to implement, distinguishing between mandatory and optional requirements.

Newcastle Computer Dispute

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the amount of benefit overpaid during the strike by computer staff at his Department's Newcastle upon Tyne office.

Mr. Newton: It is not possible to provide any reliable estimate of the total amount overpaid during the strike. The only information collected centrally about overpayments, is the amount written off as irrecoverable. This is not available until some time after the event and it would not be practicable to distinguish between overpayments resulting from the dispute and those due to other causes.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many employees are receiving family income supplement; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Whitney: At September 1984, the latest date for which information is available, of 207,000 families receiving family income supplement 180,000 were headed by a full-time employee.

The nearest comparable 1979 figures available are for October 1979 and these were 70,000 families in total of which 65,000 were headed by a full-time employee.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people have incomes below the relevant supplementary benefit level; how many of these are in full-time employment; and what were the comparable figures for 1979.

Mr. Whitney: The latest information and comparable figures for 1979 are contained in the tables "Low Income Families — 1981", a copy of which is lodged in the Library.

Ancillary Services (Competitive Tendering)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report details of the performance of each area health authority in England and Wales in putting ancillary services out to competitive tendering, to the latest available date.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have asked health authorities to provide us with reports on progress on competitive tendering and I will reply to my hon. Friend when this information is received.

Family Income Supplement (Advertising)

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what policy changes affecting public advertisement of family income supplement have been made since 1982.

Mr. Whitney: As from 1983, press and television advertising coinciding with the annual November uprating of family income supplement has been discontinued. Surveys indicated that such publicity had little effect in increasing awareness of family income supplement and we decided the major cost involved in this form of advertising was not justified. We have concentrated on other more cost-effective measures to promote family income supplement as indicated in my hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist) on 12 June 1984 at column 460. These measures are in addition to publicity in the form of the wide display of leaflets and posters, and inclusion of a page advertising family income supplement in child benefit order books.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on purchasing advertisements on all media for family income supplement in 1982-83, 1983-84 and in the current year to date.

Mr. Whitney: Expenditure on media advertisements for family income supplement was as follows:

1982-83	506,000
1983-84	Nil
1984-85	Nil

Infant Deaths

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to publish the results of the study into sudden infant deaths; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The report on the DHSS-funded mulit-centre study of post-neonatal mortality was published on 21 January. Copies have been placed in the Library.

The report suggest that up to 25 per cent. of infant deaths certified as being "sudden unexpected deaths" were capable of explanation after a full post mortem. Furthermore, it implies that a proportion of what are now classified as "cot deaths", as well as some other categories of infant deaths, could be prevented if parents were generally better informed about the signs and seriousness of childhood illness, and if health professionals also were more alert to the significance of such signs. The report has important implications, which call for a considered response. The Department is holding a conference in March to bring together professional bodies and individuals with an interest, and to promote a full discussion of the several issues raised.

Handicapped Persons (Training)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement on his visit in November 1984 to the Petö institute for the teaching and training of the physically disabled in Budapest;

(2) if he has any proposals to provide resources for the development of facilities for the teaching and training of the physically disabled similar to those in existence in Hungary;

(3) whether he proposes any initiatives to further co-operatives between the Petö institute for the teaching and training of the physically disabled in Budapest and rehabilitation units in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On my visit to the Petö educational and training institute for children with motor disorders in Budapest I was very impressed by the training programmes being undertaken to help motor and neurologically impaired children. I am glad to say that there is developing interest in the Petö method of conductive education in this country and I understand that similar training programmes are now being undertaken in several centres here. It is too early to make proposals about allocation of resources but in any case this will eventually be for health and local education authorities to determine in the light of other priorities. I have no doubt that professional staff engaged in this field in this country will continue to keep in close touch with developments at the Petö institute and elsewhere with a view to developing better methods of helping handicapped people.

Young Persons (Contraception)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report all those organisations which have, during the course of the last year, made representations to him objecting to the prescription of contraceptive drugs and devises to children under 16 years of age without their parents' consent.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The following organisations have made representations to our Department within the last year:

Amalgamated School Nurses Association
Catholic Bishops' Conference of England and Wales
Harrow Child and Family Protection Group
Knights of St. Columba
Llandaff Diocesan Committee for Social Responsibility
National British Women's Total Abstinence Union
North West Federation of the Free Church Women's Councils Order of Christian Unity
The Responsible Society

In addition, we have received the public statement signed by 15 religious and community leaders sent by Mrs. Victoria Gillick to Her Majesty.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates would be the current annual cost of raising to the long-term benefit rate, the supplementary benefit payable to persons continuously unemployed for more than 12 months, who have one child or more.

Mr. Whitney: £225 million.

Health Authorities

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that district health authority members are consulted before the appointment of new members to their authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. Friend does not appoint members of district health authorities. This is the responsibility of the regional health authorities.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that his Department's guidelines governing membership of health authorities by (a) women and (b) ethnic minorities are being adhered to.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes.

Outline Regional Strategies

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he has issued to regional health authorities with regard to the drafting of outline regional strategies.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Two circulars, HC(82)6 and HC(84)2. Both these documents also give advice on wider planning issues. Ministers or their officials have over the past year or so had discussions with all regions about their outline strategies.

National Insurance

Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of abolishing employees' national insurance contributions for all employees earning less than £100 per week.

Mr. Whitney: On the assumptions set out in his report on the draft of the Social Security (Contributions Rerating) (No. 2) Order 1984 (Cmnd. 9386), and assuming that the lower earnings limit for contracted-out rebate would also be £100 per week, the Government Actuary calculates that the cost of losing the primary national insurance contributions revenue from employees earning less than £100 per week would be around £1,020 million.

Medical Product (Safety)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will refer a product, the name of which has been supplied to him, to the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 9 January 1985, c. 519]: I am advised that this should not be considered a medicinal product within the meaning of the Medicines Act 1968. It is, in our opinion, a food and therefore the subject of the relevant food legislation.

Itinerants (Statistics)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has of the numbers of (a) hospital admissions and (b) deaths as a result of exposure arising from sleeping rough in London since the beginning of 1985.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 354]: Information on the number of hospital admissions as a result of exposure in London since the beginning of 1985 is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the North-West Thames, North-East Thames, South-East Thames and the South-West Thames regional health authorities who may be able to provide the information on hospital admissions. As regards deaths, information available from cause-of-death certificates does not provide a count of those dying from exposure arising from sleeping rough in London.

DEFENCE

Army Cataloguing Authority

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he still proposes to concentrate all the operations of the Army Cataloguing Authority in one location; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: It is not at present proposed to concentrate all the operations of the Army Cataloguing Authority on to a single site, but some rationalisation of the existing six ACA locations is being considered.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many vacancies for technical staff remained unfilled at the Army Cataloguing Authority at the most recent convenient date; and what steps are being taken to fill them.

Mr. Butler: There are at present 37 vacancies for technical staff. Many of these vacancies have been deliberately left open as in the coming 18 months the Army Cataloguing Authority will be changing over from a manual to a computerised data-handling system and the pattern of staff requirements will change over this period. The vacancies expected to arise will mostly be in different grades from those now obtaining. Recent action has concentrated on finding staff from internal and external sources willing to move with the ACA to Glasgow. Now that the ACA is no longer in the dispersal package, it is expected that most vacancies will be filled from internal sources.

Explosive Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the top 20 conventional explosive weapons which the British armed forces possess in terms of their destructive capacity; how many of each are possessed; and what is the extent of this capacity in each case.

Mr. Stanley: Of the conventional explosive weapons in service with the British armed forces, those with the greatest content of high explosive — HE — in their warhead are as follows:

Sea Systems
Sea Mines
Heavyweight Torpedoes (Mk 8 and Mk 24)
Surface to surface missile (Exocet, Harpoon)
Sub Harpoon sub-surface to surface missile
Lightweight Torpedoes (Mk 44, Mk 46, Stingray)
Air Systems
Iron Bombs
Cluster Bomb
Laser Guided Bomb
Martel air to surface missile
Bloodhound surface to air missile.

In some cases, there is more than one variant in service. Details of HE content and of numbers of weapons possessed are classified.

Operation Red Shoes

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the full purpose of Operation Red Shoes; how it relates to (a) Operation Lionheart and (b) any operations or strategies concerned with how refugees fleeing from a nuclear exchange would be dealt with by the military authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The exercise in question was a home defence communications exercise and had no connection with Exercise Lionheart. The detailed scenario of the exercise is classified. The responsibilities of civil and military authorities after nuclear attack are referred to in the draft Home Office consolidated circular to local authorities on emergency planning which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary placed in the Library on 30 July 1984.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence for how long it will be necessary for the United Kingdom to continue conducting testing of nuclear weapons underground.

Mr. Butler: Underground nuclear weapons testing is conducted by the United Kingdom in conjunction with the United States of America and in accordance with treaty commitments. Such testing as takes place is to maintain the effectiveness of our nuclear capability; it will continue for as long as required.

REME Workshops

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the annual net savings to his Department of the proposal to close the REME workshop at Newark.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to identify the net saving obtained by closing the REME workshop at Newark, but the gross saving amounts to some £3·3 million per annum.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the annual net savings to his Department of the proposal to close the REME workshop at Chilwell.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to identify the net savings obtained by closing the REME workshop at Chilwell, but the gross savings amount to some £18·4 million per annum.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what actions he has taken as a result of Colonel Templer's criticism of medical services in the Falklands.

Mr. Stanley: As I indicated to the hon. Member in my reply on 13 June 1984, at column 490, Colonel Templer was expressing his own views in his radio interview on 5 June. Medical services in the Falklands generally are the responsibility of the civil administration and are therefore a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary.

During my visit to the Falklands last July, Colonel Templer expressed concern about the adequacy of the temporary operating facilities at the British Military Hospital, Port Stanley. The Commander British Forces commissioned an immediate inspection of the facilities by the Director of Army Surgery who validated an earlier decision to provide as a high priority a new temporary operating theatre. This theatre is currently in transit to the Falklands and is due to come into use next month.

Exercise Brave Defender

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what will be the date and duration of exercise Brave Defender;

(2) whether exercise Brave Defender will involve the Territorial Army;

(3) whether exercise Brave Defender will involve units of the Home Service Force;

(4) whether exercise Brave Defender will involve regional emergency committees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Exercise Brave Defender will take place from 2 to 13 September this year. The Territorial Army, including units of the Home Service Force, will play a full part. Regional emergency committees will not be involved.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons have been killed in incidents involving members of the Ulster Defence Regiment in each of the past three years.

Mr. Stanley: Three civilians have died in the past three years as a result of action by members of the UDR in the course of their duty: one in 1982, one in 1983, and one in 1985. During the same period, 27 UDR soldiers have been killed by terrorists.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the strength of the Ulster Defence Regiment at the last date; and how many of these are Roman Catholics

Mr. Stanley: The total strengh of the Ulster Defence Regiment on 31 December 1984 was 6,468. Between 2 and 3 per cent. of the UDR have declared their religion as Roman Catholic.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to increase the strength of the Ulster Defence Regiment.

Mr. Stanley: There are at present no plans to alter the strength of the UDR.

Reforger Exercises

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is intended to exercise elements of the 501st Tactical Missile Wing at Greenham Common, as part of the Reforger exercises.

Mr. Stanley: [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 323]: Security considerations prevent me from confirming or denying the involvement of particular nuclear systems in particular exercises.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States F1-11 aircraft based in Britain will take part in January's Reforger exercises.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1985, c. 323]: F1-11 aircraft from RAF Upper Heyford and RAF Lakenheath will take part in the exercise.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Visitors (Security)

Mr. Murphy asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will take steps to assess the security implications of access by convicted terrorists to the Palace of Westminster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The responsible authorities are fully aware of the implications of the incident to which my hon. Friend refers. I have drawn his concern about the matter to their attention.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Police Cells)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the longest period of time that an unconvicted prisoner was held in police cells in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Thirty-six nights.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were held in police cells at the latest available date; and if he will give their sex and location.

Mr. Mellor: On the night of 15/16 January, seven female prisoners were held in Metropolitan police cells. This apart, no prisoners have been held in police cells this year.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) why it was found to be necessary to hold prisoners in police cells in 1984;

(2) what progress has been made towards implementing his promise given in 1983 to end the use of police cells for unconvicted and unsentenced prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: The ending of the routine use of police cells for unconvicted prisoners in the London area on 31 December 1983 proved impossible to sustain throughout the first part of 1984 because of the rise in the unsentenced prison population. However, the re-opening of Wormwood Scrubs A hall in April, the reduction of the minimum qualifying period for parole in July and the re-opening of Brixton F wing in December have dealt with the problem for adult males. The occasional use of police cells for male young offenders is being tackled by changes in catchment areas. Some difficulty remains on the female side. Every effort is being made to bring additional accommodation into use at Holloway and to recruit the necessary female staff, and the recently established review of Holloway is focused on its role as a local prison.

Non-English Language Publications

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what means the Metropolitan police have available to scrutinise non-English language publications that circulate among ethnic minorities in order to ascertain whether inflammatory material is being published that is offensive under section 70 of the Race Relations Act or the Public Order Act; what steps have been taken to bring prosecutions when such material is published; and what have been the results.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that if the police have reason to believe that such a publication might be in breach of section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936 they will arrange for it to be translated in order to determine whether an offence may have been committed. I understand there have been no prosecutions under section 5A in respect of non-English language publications.

Prisoners (Suicides)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide for each of those prisoners who committed suicide in prison in 1983 (a) any indication of the reason for the suicide, (b) the most recent medical assessment of his mental state, (c) the special precautions that were taken and (d) when he was last seen alive and by whom.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not readily available, and my noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Prisoners (Death Statistics)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the age, sex, offence and sentence and cause of death of those prisoners who died in custody in 1984.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is as follows:

Immigration Interviews (Tape-recording)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now consider the introduction of tape recording facilities for immigration interviews at ports of entry.

Mr. Waddington: No. Consideration needs to await the outcome of a further review by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of the possible use of tape recordings in interviews by entry clearance officers abroad.

Sri Lanka (Tamil Refugees)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further consideration has been given by Her Majesty's Government to the position of Tamil refugees from Sri Lanka; what is being done to allow such people to remain in the United Kingdom pending an improvement of the situation in Sri Lanka; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: We are keeping a close watch on developments in Sri Lanka. Since April 1984, no Sri Lankan Tamil who has expressed a fear of return to Sri Lanka has been returned there.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures for the number of (a) Sri Lankan Tamils and (b) Sri Lankan citizens who since July 1983 have applied for asylum in the United Kingdom; of these applications how many have so far been determined; and of these how many have (i) been granted asylum or refugee status, (ii) been granted exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom, (iii) been granted leave to remain under other provisions of the regulations and (iv) been deported or removed to Sri Lanka during the period July to December 1983 and since 1 January 1984.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not available in the form requested; immigration statistics are kept by nationality, not according to ethnic group.

During the period 1 July 1983 to 31 December 1984, about 700 applications for asylum or refugee status were received from Sri Lankan nationals, of which 450 remained outstanding at 31 December 1984. Decisions were reached on 200 applications (others were withdrawn): two were granted refugee status, 28 were granted exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom and the remainder were refused. Information on the numbers of those refused who may have been removed to Sri Lanka is not available. However, since the end of April 1984, no Sri Lankan Tamil who has expressed a fear of return to Sri Lanka has been returned there.

Citizenship (Registration)

Mr. George Robertson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people, since the Act came into force, have been registered as British citizens under section 4 of the British Nationality Act 1981; and how many of them were from Hong Kong.

Mr. Waddington: The number of people registered under section 4 of the British Nationality Act 1981 since it came into force on 1 January, 1983 is 2,167. The further information requested is not available.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied that Her Majesty's Government's food aid is properly distributed in Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: In general, yes. The Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation Commission, with whom we co-operate closely over plans for distribution, administer most of it. Transport and distribution are monitored by the World Food Programme on our behalf and we finance two British members of their monitoring team. The remainder is distributed by British voluntary agencies working in Ethiopia.

Refugees (Aid)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further aid he will give to assist the victims of the African drought and the needs of other refugees in the world.

Mr. Raison: I have decided to give £1 million to the 1985 Africa Appeal of the League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies; £1 million to the Africa Emergency Appeal of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees for use in the Sudan; £1 million to the High Commissioner's 1985 programme for Afghan refugees in Pakistan; and £2 million to the 1985 Africa General Appeal of the International Committee of the Red Cross, to allow it to continue and extend its work in Ethiopia.

Sudan (Food Aid)

Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further British food aid is being supplied to refugees in Sudan.

Mr. Raison: 15,000 tonnes of British grain financed from our national food aid programme is now on the way to Port Sudan for use in feeding refugees entering the Sudan. The shipment was originally intended for World Food Programme use in Ethiopia but has been diverted to meet the emergency needs in Sudan following assurances that the Ethiopian ports will be working to capacity in January and February 1985 even without it; and that the WFP will make up the 15,000 tonnes for Ethiopia at an appropriate time.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Equal Opportunities Monitory Unit

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he intends to take against any Northern Ireland civil servant who refuses to return the form recently distributed by the equal opportunities monitory unit.

Dr. Boyson: None. A reminder will be issued but it has been made clear to staff that completion of the questionnaire issued by the equal opportunities unit is voluntary.

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if it is the intention of the equal opportunities monitory unit to use the personal files of Northern Ireland civil servants to determine the section of the community to which they are perceived by others to belong if they do not return the questionnaire recently distributed.

Dr. Boyson: Yes.

Cold Storage Capacity

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to the total capacity of cold storage in Northern Ireland both publicly and privately owned.

Dr. Boyson: The total capacity approved by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce is approximately 58,000 tonnes, all privately owned.

Government Expenditure

Mr. Nicholson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will break down the figures in table 3.17 of the "Government's Expenditure Plan 1985-86 to 1987-88" (Cmnd. 9428-II) on the same basis as tables 3.3, 3.4, 3.5, 3.6, 3.7, 3.8, 3.9, 3.10, 3.11, 3.12, 3.13 and 3.14 of the same publication.

Dr. Boyson: This information will not be available until main Estimates for 1985-86 have been prepared by Northern Ireland Departments; I will write to the hon. Gentleman towards the end of March.

WALES

Regional Development Grant

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, as soon as it is available to him, the total regional development grant paid for Wales in 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Regional development grant paid in 1984 in respect of premises in Wales amounted to £80·8 million, of which £77·4 million was paid by the Department of Trade and Industry up to 28 November 1984 and £3·4 million by the Welsh Office from 29 November 1984.

Heath Hospital, Cardiff

Mr. Ian Grist asked the Secretay of State for Wales, if he will give details of the settlement reached on 10 February 1984 between the Welsh Health Technical Services Organisation and S. W. Milburn and Partners and W. S. Atkins and Partners pertaining to structural and material defects in the Heath hospital, Cardiff.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The settlement was reached between the Welsh health technical services organisation, acting on the advice of counsel, and the other parties. It was a term of the settlement that the agreement should be confidential to the parties subject only to the right of confidential disclosure to the Welsh Office and the Public Accounts Committee.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Medical Research Council (Cancer Research)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of the environmental epidemiology research unit of the Medical Research Council in its consideration of research into the incidence of cancer in relation to pesticides and agrochemicals.

Mr. Brooke: I understand that the Medical Research Council's environmental epidemiology unit is conducting a study of cancer incidence and mortality in a group of workers exposed to herbicides and pesticides in the course of manufacture and application, that the gathering of data for the study is complete and that the unit is at present analysing the data.

Class Sizes

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children in primary and secondary schools are in classes with (a) 31 to 35 pupils, (b) 36 to 40 pupils and (c) over 40 pupils.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is as follows:

Numbers of children in schools by size of class (England, January 1984)

Number of pupils in class	30 or fewer pupils	31-35 pupils	36-40 pupils	Over 40 pupils	Total
Classes taught by one teacher
Primary	2,608,929	796,447	87,368	7,747	3,498,491
Secondary	2,999,803	363,704	12,795	3,216	3,379,518
Classes taught by two or more teachers
Primary	72,908	34,606	18,051	46,044	171,609
Secondary	40,001	12,848	7,051	104,264	164,164
All classes
Primary	2,679,837	831,053	105,419	53,791	3,670,100
Secondary	3,039,804	376,552	19,846	107,480	3,543,682

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the purpose of the present system of incremental pay scales for teachers in maintained schools; and if this purpose is being achieved.

Sir Keith Joseph: The purpose of the present system is not made explicit in the pay agreement made by the responsible Burnham committee. Recent work by and under the committee has addressed criticisms of the present system as regards the rewards for differing levels of experience, expertise and responsibility, and the career structure for teachers.

PRIME MINISTER

Falkland Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Prime Minister if she will place in the Library a copy of the constitutional document concerning the Falkland Islands which has been discussed by the Falklands Legislative Council.

The Prime Minister: A copy of this document was placed in the Library of the House yesterday.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

False and Misleading Price Information (Review)

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations have been conducted on the interdepartmental working party's review of legislation on false and misleading price information; what action he now intends to take; and if he will consider extending the review to cover consumer price indications for real property, including new houses.

Mr. Fletcher: I hope to make an announcement to the House on this matter shortly.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Public Borrowing

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's target for the level of public borrowing as a proportion of gross domestic product.

Mr. Peter Rees: The Government's policies are directed towards a progressive reduction in public borrowing over the medium term. The Chancellor's autumn statement gave a forecast of £8½ billion for the PSBR in 1984-85, equivalent to 2·5 per cent. of gross domestic product. Illustrative figures for later years are set out in the medium-term financial strategy, published in the 1984-85 Financial Statement and Budget Report, and these will be reviewed at Budget time.

Nationalised Industries

Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he proposes to take to reappraise the relative rates of return of all nationalised industries.

Mr. Peter Rees: Successive Governments have required industries' investment programmes to earn a real rate of return of 5 per cent. before tax. Individual financial targets spanning a fixed period are set for nearly all nationalised industries. They are usually expressed in terms of a current cost operating profit as a percentage of revalued assets and are based on discussion with the industries. They reflect a judgment about the application of the basic principles on investment and economic pricing to the particular trading environment of the industry concerned. Industries' rates of return are, therefore, already systematically reviewed from time to time and I see no need for further reappraisal.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to date to the public sector borrowing requirement of the dispute in the mining industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: The autumn statement gave an estimate of abut £1½ billion as the cost to the PSBR in 1984-85 on the assumption that the strike would end on 31 December 1984. It is too soon to give any new estimate of cost.

Bank Interest

Mr. Hickmet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is now in a position to make a statement about the arrangements for non-resident individuals in connection with the composite rate scheme for bank interest introduced by the Finance Act 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes. The new scheme provides for the exclusion from the composite rate tax arrangements of deposits held by individuals who are not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, provided the deposit taker holds an appropriate declaration, signed either by the non-resident beneficially entitled to the interest, or by a person receiving the interest on his behalf, certifying that the individual concerned is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and that a relevant change in residence status will be notified to the deposit taker.

It has become clear, in the light of recent discussions with the banks, that the form and content of these declarations need to be more precisely defined both to ensure effective compliance and in the interest of efficient implementation of the scheme. We therefore propose to introduce measures this year to facilitate this. Details will be given in an Inland Revenue press release which, with my authority, it is issuing later today.

DEFENCE

Reme Workshops

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated total cost of the refurbishment and so on which will be required at Bicester, Bovington, Donnington and Old Dalby in consequence of the closure of the REME workshops at Chilwell and Newark.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to separate the consequences of the closure of Chilwell and Newark in cost terms from refurbishment and other costs arising from the totality of REME static workshop review proposals. The estimated capital investment needed in the workshops mentioned in order to satisfy the requirements proposed for the reorganisation of the static workshops are:

Bicester	805,000
Bovington	885,000
Donnington	130,000
Old Dalby	600,000

However, there are capital savings associated with the closures; these amount to £4 million. to which should be added the realisable value of the Chilwell and Newark sites, assessed together at £1·5 million.

Amber Alert (Liverpool)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence why members of the armed forces were placed on amber alert in Liverpool in November 1984.

Mr. Stanley: It would not be in the public interest to comment in detail on the reasons for the particular alert states applying to the armed forces; but we must be alert to the danger of terrorist attack. The state of alert in November 1984 applied throughout the United Kingdom.

Winter Temperatures (Lanarkshire)

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Defence what temperatures have been recorded for the Meteorological Office at Carnwath, Lanarkshire, in each winter month in each of the last five years; and what is the latest temperature recorded.

Mr. Lee: There is no meteorological office at Carnwath, Lanarkshire. However, temperature measurements are available to the Meteorological Office free of charge from a voluntary climatological observer there. These consist of daily maximum and minimum temperatures and the temperature measured at 9 am each day and are reported monthly in arrears.

To extract from archives the 2,700 temperatures recorded over the period requested would involve disproportionate effort. The latest measurement, obtained by telephone from the volunteer, the minimum temperature on 21 January 1985, was minus 10°C. However, the following details are illustrative.

ENERGY

Magnox Reactors

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will provide information on the thermal energy generated and spent fuel discharged by each of the Central Electricity Generating Board's magnox reactors in the fiscal year 1983-84;

(2) if he will provide information on the amount of plutonium produced, and the total of all isotopes, by each of the Central Electricity Generating Board magnox reactors in each fiscal year from 1978-79 to 1983-84;

(3) if he will provide information on the amount of plutonium in the spent fuel in storage at the each of the Central Electricity Generating Board's magnox reactors on 31 March 1978 and on 31 March 1984;

(4) if he will update to 31 March 1984 the information on the allocation of plutonium produced in Central Electricity Generating Board and South of Scotland Electricity Board magnox reactors given in reply to the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester), on 27 July 1983, Official Report, column 438.

Mr. Goodlad: The following table sets out the allocation or use of plutonium produced in the Magnox reactors of the CEGB and SSEB at 31 March 1984.

Table One
Allocation of Plutonium produced in CEGB or SSEB Magnox reactors. Position at 31 March 1984.

	Tonnes (Nearest ½tonne)
Plutonium in irradiated fuel
(a) Estimated in fuel in CEGB/SSEB Magnox reactors	9
(b) Estimated plutonium in fuel discharged from CEGB/SSEB Magnox reactors, but not yet reprocessed	3½
Separated plutonium
(c) In stock at British Nuclear Fuels Ltd as oxide	19½
(d) In process at British Nuclear Fuels Ltd in intermediate other forms (eg. nitrate)	½
(e) Sold or leased to UKAEA for Fast Reactor R & D since 1969	5
(f) Exported for civil purposes to countries other than the US	½
Sub total	38
(g) Balance (see note (g) below)

Notes
(a) These figures are derived from the known tonnage of fuel elements and their estimated overall average irradiation and cannot be accurately calculated.
(b) As for (a). About 30% of amount shown was held by BNFL.
(c) About 20% of amount shown was held by BNFL.
(g) The balance of plutonium produced in the Boards' Magnox reactors was consigned to the United States before 1971 under the United States/United Kingdom Defence Agreement, and as stated by the Prime Minister, on 21 April 1964, was used by United States for civil purposes. Because of the barter arrangements under which this plutonium was consigned, it would not be in the national interest to publish this figure.

The thermal output generated and spent fuel discharged for each of the CEGB's Magnox stations in 1983-84 was as follows:

Table Two

Station	Thermal Output (Gwh)	Fuel Discharged (tonnes u)
Bradwell	5448	64
Berkeley	3786	8
Hinkley Point A	13416	104
Trawsfynydd	10678	105
Dungeness A	10368	94
Sizewell	11552	91
Oldbury	10668	97
Wylfa	24249	121

The total of the board's plutonium in spent fuel in storage at the stations and at Sellafield at 31 March 1984 is given in table one line b. Typical plutonium production rates for Magnox reactors were given by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Shaw) in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) on 27 July 1983 at column 439. I have nothing to add.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has decided which consortia will receive grants for the preparation of a prospectus for a combined heat and power district heating scheme following his announcement on 5 April 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: On 5 April, I announced the Government's willingness to make up to three grants, not exceeding £0·25 million each, to consortia for the preparation of a prospectus for a combined heat and power/district heating scheme. I said then that the preferred choice would be one scheme in each of Northern Ireland, Scotland and England and that the Government would be looking for substantial private sector involvement in the consortia. I received 10 proposals.

In deciding upon the consortia to receive further funding, I particularly took into account:

the extent to which the proposal covered the features requested in my earlier announcement;
the commitment expressed by private sector interests to the consortia;
the technical strength of consortium participants;
the existence of strong local support;
the likelihood of private sector funding for the eventual scheme;
the contribution of the proposal to the wider application of CHP in the United Kingdom.

After detailed examination of the proposals, and following consultation with my colleagues, I propose to offer grants to the following consortia:

The Joint Venture for CHP in Belfast;
The Industrial Group for Edinburgh CHP;
The Leicester Consortium for CHP.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Non-English Language Publications

Mr. Eldon Griffiths asked the Attorney-General what means he has available to scrutinise non-English language publications that circulate among ethnic minorities in order to ascertain whether inflammatory material is being published that is offensive under section 70 of the Race Relations Act or the Public Order Act; what steps he has taken to bring prosecutions when such material is published; and what have been the results.

The Attorney-General: I do not have the facilities available within my Department for the routine scrutiny of non-English language publications. If I receive a complaint about such publications, and have reason to believe that an offence may have been committed under this provision, I will ask the Director of Public Prosecutions to refer the matter to the police, who have translation facilities available to them. Before reaching a decision to refer the matter to the police for translation, I welcome an indication, however rough, of the contents of the material. So far as I am aware there have been no prosecutions under section 5A Public Order Act 1936 in respect of non-English language publications. However, in 1982 the Director of Public Prosecutions on his own initiative referred two editions of "Punjab Times" and one edition of "Des Pardes" to the police for translation. The Director decided that no action under section 5A Public Order Act was required in respect of these editions, and did not refer the matter to me.

Commander Wreford-Brown

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Attorney-General if the Director of Public Prosecutions will prosecute Commander Wreford-Brown in respect of information provided by him and published in "Our Falklands War" in March 1983.

The Attorney-General: The circumstances of the publication of "Our Falklands War" have not been referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions by the Ministry of Defence or any other body or individual.

EMPLOYMENT

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons have applied for assistance under the enterprise allowance scheme whose applications were refused because of a lack of places under the scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: High demand for places early in 1984 meant that many people had to wait before they could proceed with their applications. However, in response to this demand the number of places available on the scheme was increased substantially and waiting lists were eliminated.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish for the latest available date a table showing the numbers out of work and the unemployment rate for each of the countries of the EEC and for each of the four countries of the United Kingdom respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: Following is the available information using national unadjusted series, and also including standardised unemployment rates compiled by the OECD. The latter are only available in the form of rates. The national unadjusted figures are not comparable because of differences in definitions and coverage of the statistics, while the OECD standardised rates take account of these differences as far as possible.

*Not available.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been unemployed for over 12 months; and what were the comparable figures in April 1979.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the numbers of people unemployed for over 12 months; and what this is as a proportion of those out of work.

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) by what percentage the total number of unemployed in the Hertfordshire, West constituency has changed between December 1983 and December 1984;

(2) by what percentage the total number of unemployed women in the Hertfordshire, West constituency has changed between September 1984 and December 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is available in the House of Commons Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Taiwan

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement of Government policy regarding the Republic of China on Taiwan and future diplomatic and commercial relations.

Mr. Luce: Since 1950 Her Majesty's Government have dealt with the Government of the People's Republic of China as the sole legal Goverment of China. Accordingly there can be no question of entering into diplomatic or other official relations with the authorities in Taiwan.

British industry has substantial commercial dealings with Taiwan, but these are pursued through non-official channels.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his estimate of the total cost against his budget of maintaining the Falkland Islands for the present financial year; and what are the corresponding figures for 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mr. Renton: There is no provision in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office budget for the normal cost of maintaining the Falkland Islands. Normal expenditure is met from the Falkland Islands Government revenues.

Provision has, however, been made in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office budget for rehabilitation and development aid, and for the cost of the Diplomatic Service personnel in Port Stanley. These costs are approximately as follows:

	Rehabilitation and Development Aid £ million	Diplomatic Service Personnel £
1982-83	10	152,000
1983-84	6	170,000
1984-85*	8	187,000

* Estimate.

Hong Kong

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will analyse the present population of the colony of Hong Kong, other than persons temporarily resident there, according to their existing nationality, specifying in each category the basis of that status and the estimated numbers holding it.

Mr. Luce: According to the latest figures available the total population of Hong Kong is approximately 5·3 million. The Hong Kong Government estimate that this figure is made up as follows:

A. 20,000 British Citizens (with right of abode in the United Kingdom).
B. 3 million British Dependent Territories citizens (with right of abode in Hong Kong).
C. 1·8 million Chinese residents (ie persons of Chinese race with the right to reside in Hong Kong).
C. 400,000 other persons of Chinese race (who have lived in Hong Kong for less than seven years and have not therefore acquired the right of permanent residence).
E. 95,500 Other foreign nationals.
F. 4,500 Stateless persons of non-Chinese race, most of whom originate from Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the new category of British nationality (overseas) is proposed for Hong Kong instead of the existing category of British overseas citizenship; and in what significant respects the former differs from the latter.

Mr. Luce: We believe that the circumstances of Hong Kong are unique and should be reflected in a unique status. There are also reasons why British overseas citizenship would not be an "appropriate status" within the terms of the United Kingdom memorandum. For example, British overseas citizenship may be acquired at any time by registration, but the United Kingdom memorandum imposes time limits on the acquisition of the new status.

The benefits to be accorded to holders of the proposed new status of "British national (overseas)" are still under detailed consideration and will be subject to parliamentary approval. The Government intend, however, that they should be broadly the same as those enjoyed by British dependent territories citizens, except for transmissibility. This means that there are unlikely to be major differences under United Kingdom law in the benefits enjoyed by holders of the proposed British national (overseas) status and the existing British overseas citizenship.

TRANSPORT

Stage Carriage Bus Services

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many applications for road service licences to run stage carriage bus services have been made in the last two years for which figures are available; and how many of these applications have been refused.

Mr. David Mitchell: In 1982-83 2,005 applications were made for new road service licences (excluding renewals and excursions and tours). Three hundred and fifty-one applications were opposed of which 104 were withdrawn following objection and 18 refused. The comparable figures for 1983-84 were 1,885, 319, 93 and seven.

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has made any study of the navigational implications of the provisions contained in the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill.

Mr. David Mitchell Before making its report on the Bill in due course, the Government will consider all its aspects, including those affecting navigation.

Railway Closures

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to enable all objectors appearing before transport users' consultative committees in connection with railway closures to be represented by counsel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: There is nothing in the present law to prevent the chairman of a transport user's consultative committee allowing objectors to be represented by counsel when public hearings into rail passenger closure proposals are held, and I understand that some chairman already do so.

Severn Bridge (Tolls)

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now announce his decision, following the commissioners' report, about the proposal to increase toll charges on the Severn bridge.

Mrs. Chalker: As I explained to the hon. Member in my reply of 3 December 1984 at column 32, the inspector's report is being considered. The decision will be announced as soon as possible.

Road Signs

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the annual cost of maintenance of road signs for the years 1980 to 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: The cost of maintaining road signs is not recorded as a separate item. However, the total costs of routine maintenance of permanent road signs, traffic signals, pedestrian crossings and motorway communications equipment in England in the financial years 1980-81 to 1982-83 were as follows:

£ million

	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83
Motorways and trunk roads	5·125	5·792	6·596
Local authority roads	32·758	37·924	40·672
Total	37·883	43·716	47·268

Final figures for 1983-84 are not yet available.

Maritime Research Projects and Studies

Mr. Prescott asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the research projects and studies on maritime issues which are currently under commission by his Department, their purpose, the organisations which are carrying out the work, and the costs.

Mr. David Mitchell: The total value of research under commission during the present financial year is £3·281 million. I shall write to the hon. Member giving information about individual projects.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Development (Leeds)

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what urban development grant schemes have been approved for Leeds; at what cost to public funds; and how much private investment they have generated.

Sir George Young: Six projects in Leeds are the subject of current offers of urban development grant. The estimated public expenditure is £5 million and this will lever an estimated £9·9 million of private investment. Three other offers of UDG have not been taken up. The six projects are as follows:

Construction of 45 low cost houses and flats for sale at Hill street, Beeston (UDG £158,000; total project cost £1,023,000).

Refurbishment of difficult-to-let local authority housing on the Raynville estate to provide 238 flats for sale and 49 new houses (UDG £2,311,000; total project cost £6,700,000).

Construction of four shop units at Chapeltown road (UDG £96,000; total project cost £267,000).

Provision of 85,000 sq ft of industrial space at Balm and Beza roads (UDG £1,349,000; total project cost £3,335,000).

Conversion to provide premises at Nineveh road for an expanding catering business (UDG £109,000; total project cost £257,000).

Conversion and construction to provide 120 dwellings for assured tenancies and sale at Crown point bridge (UDG £942,000, English heritage grant £60,000, total project cost £3,409,000).

Homes Insulation

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a table giving, by quarter since their inception, for England (a) the number of dwellings insulated under the local authorities energy conservation programme and a breakdown of the body which completed the work, (b) the cost of the programme and (c) the number of dwellings insulated under the home insulation scheme and a breakdown of tenancies to whom the grants were paid, (d) the amounts of the payments, (e) the number of 90 per cent. grants paid and their costs and (f) the financial allocation for each of the past financial years to each of these schemes and the allocation for the current financial year.

Sir George Young: Available quarterly figures of numbers of dwellings in England insulated under the energy conservation programme and the home insulation scheme, from third quarter 1979 to third quarter 1984, appear in "Housing and Construction Statistics" tables 2.18 of issue 7, 2.16 of issue 12 and 2.17 of issue 19 which also contains estimated payments from third quarter 1982; the earlier figures of numbers under the home insulation scheme are in table 2.16 of issue 4.

Copies of these publications are in the Library. The sub-division of energy conservation work according to the organisation carrying out the work has not been collected since the second quarter 1984.

Turnstiles and Revolving Doors

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will amend the building regulations so as to restrict the installation and use of turnstiles and revolving doors in public buildings.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has no plans to amend the building regulations for this purpose.

Water Authorities

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to enable water authorities to borrow on the open market.

Mr. Macfarlane: Water authorities are enabled by virtue of section 2(1) of the Water Act 1983 to borrow on the open market, subject to the consent of the Secretary of State and the approval of the Treasury.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of the additional funds generated by the increased rate of return set for the water authorities will be retained by the authorities for their own use.

Mr. Macfarlane: As the following table shows, the higher rates of return to be achieved by the water authorities in England in 1985-86 will enable £76 million more investment to go ahead with £71 million less borrowing:

	*Capital Expenditure	†External Finance Limit
1984-85 (Cmnd. 9143)	686	‡240
1985-86 (Cmnd. 9428)	762	‡169

* Excluding land drainage.
† Excluding land drainage grants.
‡ Consistent with EFLs for England and Wales (including land drainage grants) published in Cmnd. 9143 and Cmnd. 9428.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in what precise form he has communicated to water authorities their financial targets for 1985-86.

Mr. Macfarlane: My hon. Friend, the Minister for Housing and Construction has written to the Chairmen of the English Water Authorities to tell them their financial targets for 1985-86. They will also have copies of an order under section 29 of the Water Act 1973 which has been laid before the House.

Water Act 1973

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions the powers vested in him by section 29(2) of the Water Act 1973 have been used.

Mr. Macfarlane: Five.

Ronan Point

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the records of the public inquiry into the collapse of Ronan Point to be available for authorised inspection; and if he will make a further statement concerning previously reported losses of documents.

Mr. Gow: I have written to the hon. Member, informing him that the papers will be available for inspection from 28 January.

In my letter of 10 December 1984 I informed the hon. Member that the inquiry's papers recovered from storage last October are incomplete. Thorough searches continue to be made for the remaining papers, and copies of some have been found. But it is possible that some were destroyed when the papers were reviewed in 1973 under the normal procedures for the review of all Departmental documents after five years.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what compulsory purchase orders have been laid by the London Docklands Development Corporation; and what is the nature or content of the reasons in support of such orders that the corporation plans to present to any ensuing statutory procedures.

Sir George Young: The only order submitted to my right hon. Friend is the London Docklands Development Corporation (Johnson's Draw, Ferry Street, London E14) CPO 1984. The stated reason for the order is that it is for the purpose of providing public open space and access to the river for small craft to be landed and launched.

Water Supplies (Liverpool)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the pollution of water supply in the Liverpool area; what plans he has to give protection against a recurrence of such pollution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: No water supplies have been contaminated in the Liverpool area in recent weeks.

On two recent occasions, chemicals have been spilled in the River Dee catchment. Thanks to the prompt and well-planned action of the Welsh water authority and the North-West water authority, and the two water companies concerned, none of the polluting material has entered any water supply.

I have seen various understandable expressions of concern, but it is clear that the water undertakers were ready and able to deal with the problems arising from these two spillages.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the numbers of curies of plutonium-238, plutonium-239, plutonium-240, plutonium-241 and plutonium-242, separately for each isotope, discharged to sea from the Sellafield-Windscale plant during the period 1963 to 1982 inclusive.

Mr. Waldegrave: Discharge figures for plutonium-238, plutonium-239 and plutonium-241 for the period 1963 to 1982 are contained in table 3.1 of the National Radiological Protection Board's report entitled "The risks of leukaemia and other cancers in Seascale from radiation exposure", reference NRPB-R171. Copies of this report are available in the Library of the House.

Prior to 1978 plutonium-238 was not separately analysed but it was included in the figure given in the table for plutonium-239. Plutonium-240 has never been separately analysed but it is included in the plutonium-239 figure. Plutonium-242 has at no time been analysed separately.

Queen's Birthday Parade

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of seats available for the Queen's birthday parade; and how many spaces are provided for wheelchairs.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.

A total of 7,780 seats are available for the Queen's birthday parade. Space is provided for 20 wheelchairs.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people applied for tickets for the Queen's birthday parade; of these how many applicants required wheelchair space; and how many people in each case were refused tickets in each year since 1980.

Mr. Stanley: I have been asked to reply.

No detailed records are kept of applications for seats and wheelchair places, but on average about one in 10 of the applications from the general public for a seat and two in five of the applications for a wheelchair place would be successful.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Animal Welfare

Mr. Greenway asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those local authorities which have appointed animal welfare officers, and those which have not done so; and if he will detail the number of prosecutions brought by local authorities for animal abuse in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: All local authorities must, under the terms of the Animal Health Act 1981, appoint inspectors whose duty it is to execute and enforce the Act. These responsibilities include orders made under the Act for the protection of animal welfare in transit and at markets. Local authorities are also responsible for carrying out and enforcing the provisions of the Slaughter of Poultry Act 1967 and Part II of the Slaughterhouses Act 1974 which lay down provisions for the welfare of animals in slaughterhouses.

Information on criminal proceedings is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. I understand that information held centrally does not separately distinguish local authorities as instigators of proceedings.

Cereals

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the Government's policy objectives for cereals in the forthcoming EEC price negotiations; and if he will seek to ensure that cereal prices are reduced.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 17 January 1985 at col. 198.

Beef

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total quantity of beef purchased by the intervention board in Northern Ireland during 1984.

Mr. Jopling: The total quantity of beef purchased in Northern Ireland in 1984 by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce is estimated at 36,190 tonnes.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of beef sold into intervention in Northern Ireland during 1984 was (a) bone-in and (b) bone-out.

Mr. Jopling: All intervention beef is purchased bone-in. However, of the 36,190 tonnes purchased by the intervention board in Northern Ireland in 1984, 46 per cent. was stored bone-in and 54 per cent. was allocated for boning.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Schizophrenia

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what amount and what proportion of National Health Service expenditure has been devoted to the care and treatment of patients suffering from schizophrenia in each year since 1974.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many patients were receiving treatment in the National Health Service for schizophrenia at a convenient date in each year since 1974;

(2) what proportion of National Health Service beds in each year since 1974 have been taken up by schizophrenia patients.

Mr. John Patten: Information by diagnosis is collected centrally only on hospital inpatients and is not precisely in the form requested. The available information which can be provided without disproportionate cost is given in the table.

Admission to, Discharges from, and Deaths in Mental Illness Hospitals and Units in England of Patients with a diagnosis of Schizophrenic Psychoses

Year	Admissions†	Discharges†	Deaths
1974	26,900	27,801	1,369
1975	27,013	27,777	1,287
1976	27,388	27,798	1,473
1977	25,738	26,560	1,264
1978	24,999	25,615	1,261
*1979	24,283	24,617	1,277
*1980	24,747	25,240	1,260
*1981	25,313	25,992	1,146
*1982	23,934	24,594	1,170
*1983	24,314	25,336	1,045

* The figures from 1979 may not be precisely comparable with the figures for earlier years because of changes in the coding system used.
† Some patients have more than one admission and subsequent discharge in a year and are represented more than once in the figures. Equally, some patients can be treated for several years between admission and discharge or death.

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what public funds have been made available for research into schizophrenia in each year since 1974.

Mr. Brooke: I have been asked to reply.

The Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid through the Department, is the main Government agency for the promotion of medical research in the United Kingdom. The Department of Health and Social Security also supports research through its health service research programme. I understand that the expenditure on research projects on schizophrenia by the MRC and the DHSS since 1980 (excluding expenditure by the MRC on projects which might contribute indirectly to an understanding of schizophrenia) is as follows:

Financial year	£000s (cash) MRC	DHSS
1980-81	1,419	2·1
1981-82	1,518	10·5
1982-83	1,634	15·4
1983-84	1,778	14·3

No figures are available for MRC expenditure on research in this area prior to 1980-81.

Research work relevant to schizophrenia is also being conducted in universities and medical schools, financed from the block grant to universities allocated for teaching and research on advice from the University Grants Committee. Figures are not available.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any representations calling for the burden of national insurance contributions to be removed from employers in respect of newly engaged staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: No direct representations have been received by the Department. I am, of course, aware of the Conservative Political Centre pamphlet "Jobs Ahead" which makes various suggestions about reducing the burden of national insurance contributions on employers. The structure of contributions will be considered in the context of the reviews of social security.

Cancer (Deaths)

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number of deaths from cancer over the past three years in the area covered by the Grimsby health authority.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Numbers of deaths from malignant neoplasms (ICD 140-208) in the Grimsby health authority area for the latest three years available are shown in the table.

	Male	Female	Persons
1981	203	179	382
1982	201	208	409
1983	219	171	390

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what he estimates would be the current annual cost of raising to £5,000 the amount of savings disregarded in assessing supplementary benefit.

Mr. Whitney: Sufficient reliable data are not available to enable precise calculations to be made of the cost of raising the supplementary benefit capital disregard but our best estimate of the cost of raising the level to £5,000 is £30 million a year.

Young Persons (Benefits)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the projected estimate of Government expenditure in 1985-86 on supplementary benefit, child benefit, unemployment benefit and housing benefit in respect of 16 and 17-year-olds.

Mr. Whitney: Estimated expenditure on child benefit for 16 and 17-year-olds in 1985-86 at November 1984 benefit rates is £300 million. The information requested on the other benefits is not available as we do not make forecasts of the age distribution of recipients of these benefits.

Rivermead Rehabilitation Centre

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if there is any action he will be taking to secure the future of the Rivermead rehabilitation centre in Oxford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The future of the Rivermead centre is secure. The regional health authority believes, however, that the centre would be better located in due course on the Churchill hospital site in Oxford, close to Ritchie Russell house, which is specially designed for the care of younger disabled people. This proposal will be first subjected to full and formal consultation which I am informed is likely to commence during March.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing how far the ambient temperature would have to fall in each Scottish region in the months of December, January and February in order to trigger special payments for pensioners under the severe weather allowances scheme.

Mr. Whitney: In addition to the regular weekly help with fuel costs available to supplementary benefit claimants, the regulations provide for single payments to be awarded to supplementary benefit claimants who have used more fuel than they have budgeted for because of a period of exceptionally severe weather. The basis on which such payments may be made is set out in my replies to my hon. Friends the Members for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) and for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 21 January at columns 349-352.

The table lists for different areas of Scotland the "trigger points" — the points at which the Chief Adjudication Officer considers the "exceptionally severe weather" conditions in the regulations to be satisfied— grouped according to the seven weather stations used for Scotland. For each weather station the table shows the local social security offices in the area and the region(s) covered. The same trigger points apply throughout the year. The table also shows the average weekly temperature (the average of the mean daily temperatures over seven days) which would be needed to reach the trigger point.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 71

SESSION 1984-85

14th January—25th January 1985

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speakers ruling and statement'.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading 'Speaker'.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of the volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
